Get ready for kosher pot, and what happened in the Garden of Eden?

OU certifies marijuana products

A New York company said last week it's preparing to market what it says is the world's first kosher-certified pot. The Orthodox Union has certified Vireo Health of New York's non-smokable medical marijuana products, Vireo said Dec. 29. Vireo is one of five medical marijuana providers selected to take part in a New York state medical marijuana program that goes into effect this month. None of the others will be certified kosher. "Being certified kosher by the OU will not only help us serve the dietary needs of the largest Jewish community in the United States, but also combat unfortunate stigmas associated with medical cannabis," Vireo CEO Ari Hoffnung said.

Cotler honoured by WJC affiliate

Former Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler was honoured Dec. 21 in Jerusalem by the International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians, an affiliate of the World Jewish Congress since 2006, for his legislative achievements and human rights work. His successor, Liberal Anthony Housefather was among 12 current Jewish parliamentarians from around the world brought to Israel last month for three days of meetings with Knesset members and officials.

It's medicinal. Really!

Was Eve really made from Adam's rib?

American Jewish University professor Ziony Zevit has raised a stir with a new book that says Eve was made from a bone in Adam's penis, not his rib, as per tradition. In What Really Happened in the Garden of Eden, Zevit, who studies biblical literature and Semitic languages, makes the case that the Genesis account is the only place in the Bible where the Hebrew word tzela means "rib." Elsewhere, it means the side of something. Also, since men and women have the same number of ribs, how could one have been taken from the first man? And while human phalluses have no bones, other mammals' penises do. But critics say the idea is phallacious. Ha'aretz journalist Elon Gilad noted the text says God takes "something from Adam of which he has many," there are instances of tzela meaning rib in other Semitic languages, and there's a Sumerian myth about life being created from a rib. ■

The status of the Kotel

Norma Baumel Joseph states that the Kotel is "not a synagogue" ("We won't stop until we have equal rights at the Kotel," Dec.10) and therefore, Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz, the legal administrator, has no authority to issue guidelines that restrict women from praying with a Torah there.

The Kotel is indeed a synagogue where services are held every day of the year, and there is a regulation, enacted in 2010, that does prohibit women from bringing a Torah to the Kotel Plaza, so Rabbi Rabinowitz's ruling is consistent with the law.

Jews and Christmas

Michael Taube's column ("Jews and Christmas: enjoy the holiday," Dec. 17) is very troubling.

Maintaining strong Jewish identities within our community is crucial for our community's future, and threats to this future abound, with the high costs of Jewish education and the rising rates of intermarriage. For Jewish communities to thrive in the future, Jewish children must be raised in a Jewish environment with an understanding of who they are. Jews who choose to celebrate Christmas (or any other non-Jewish holiday) in their homes are confusing their children and putting their Jewish identities at risk.

During this season, Canadian Jews cannot help but be immersed in the "Christmas spirit" because it surrounds us in many places. We can appreciate the beauty of decorations in the malls and on the homes of neighbours, and we can enjoy the music of the season on the radio, but Christmas celebrates a significant event for Christians, and it is not our holiday.

Jews and Christmas II

I have no problem with Michael Taube being irreligious, agnostic, atheist or whatever religious title he bestows upon himself. But to flaunt his utter love for Christmas, almost in the same breath as his disdain for Chanukah, has no place in the pages of The CJN.

I grew up in Montreal among Christian friends and have many today, especially in the Armenian community. I have had many of them over for Pesach seders, Shabbat dinners and Rosh Hashanah celebrations. The respect we have for each other's holidays and traditions is mutual.

I have been buying Christmas gifts for my Christian friends for as long as I can remember. I have enjoyed listening to Christmas music for as long as I remember. I love seeing the Christmas decorations and enjoy going to Christmas parties whenever I am invited.

But my wife and I do not celebrate Christmas as a holiday in our home.

We don't flaunt it above our own holidays and traditions – no trees, pagan or otherwise, no wreaths, no presents for Jewish friends or family members etc.

Taube needs reminding that the word Christmas means "Christ's Mass."

Kol hakavod to the Beth Tzedec choir for resigning under pressure to affirm their Jewish identity ("Renowned Beth Tzedec choir resigns en masse," Dec. 17).

This act of maintaining solidarity with their non-Jewish colleagues speaks volumes for the choir as individuals and reflects a very poor, outdated judgment on the part of the authorities who proposed this. We are living in Canada in the 21st century (or 5776, if you prefer), not in some medieval ghetto.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Accommodating interfaith families

What are the limits to synagogues' acceptance of the new reality, and how can they encourage young Jews to keep a strong connection to their own community?

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LAB, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: The issue of interfaith families has arisen lately, both in my rabbinic life and in the greater community. I would love to hear how you deal with people who have married or are partnered with non-Jews.

Are there limits to what you are willing to extend to them in terms of ritual or communal life?

How much of your decision is governed by communal norms, and how much of it is theologically driven?

I am torn between, on the one hand, wanting to accept interfaith couples as far as I theologically can and, on the other, still wanting to set a boundary about how limits can and should matter.

Rabbi Scheim: I see this as primarily an issue of communal norms and less as a theological concern.

Even though my community does not include non-Jews in ritual roles and extends synagogue membership only to Jews, we have become more sensitized to the needs of intermarried Jews, or Jews in significant relationships with non-Jews.

There was a time when our institutions stigmatized the intermarried, as if the cold shoulder approach would prevent a single intermarriage. But the truth is that no one benefits when Jews and their partners are made to feel unwelcome in a synagogue. After all, how are we to encourage an intermarried couple to raise their children as Jews if they are shunned in our community?

True, we will not call up a non-Jew to the Torah, but we will make the non-Jewish spouse or partner of a Jew feel welcome and respected in our community.

With few exceptions, Jews who intermarry have not acted in rebellion against the Jewish People. They simply fell in love.

Yes, our demographics are better served by endogamic Jewish relationships, but an unwelcoming posture toward those who intermarry helps no one, least of all the Jewish People.

> Guilt is not enough to encourage Jews to marry other Jews.

Rabbi Finegold: I agree about removing the negative associations that many of us grew up with and that we have a need to welcome intermarried couples and families into our religious lives.

For example, the classic custom of sitting shivah for a child who intermarried may have deterred some people from intermarrying at some point in time, but it seems to not have any teeth anymore. Furthermore, intermarried individuals and families have demonstrated that many of them still desire to have a strong connection to their community and their faith.

I am skeptical about the argument that it is a demographic preference for Jews to marry Jews and not something more than that. We need to construct an argument that goes beyond telling our children that they should only fall in love with another Jew because "it would be good for our numbers."

Rabbi Scheim: Your point is valid. Guilt is not enough to encourage Jews to marry other Jews.

There is a serious demographic concern, but that will not persuade our youth to direct their love within Jewish circles. More than that is necessary.

Our goal should be creating new generations of passionate Jews for whom Jewish identity, Jewish practice and Jewish life are of the highest importance. Should that be the case, it is far more likely that the life decisions they make will take into account the need for a solid, sustainable Jewish tomorrow. ■

Will 2016 bring changes to Israel, or more of the same?

As 2016 begins, the situation in Israel looks much the same as it did during a difficult 2015. The first weekend of the year saw a terror attack at a pub on Dizengoff Street in the heart of Tel Aviv, which left two people dead. The alleged perpetrator, Nashat Milhem, an Israeli Arab who previously served five years in prison for attacking an Israeli soldier in 2007, is also suspected of subsequently murdering a taxi driver in the city's north end.

As Israeli security forces searched for Milhem over the weekend, Tel Aviv residents were left on edge, debating even whether to send their children to school while a terrorist remained on the loose, armed, reportedly, with a submachine gun and plenty of ammunition. The spectre of a murderer on the run only added to the tension Israelis have felt for three long months during a spree of terror attacks some are calling a new intifadah. Whatever you want to call it, the current spate of terrorism, including knife attacks and car rammings, often committed by Israeli Arabs and celebrated by Palestinian leaders, shows no signs of abating.

Meanwhile, the early days of January also brought a stark reminder of one of 2015's most painful moments in Israel. On Sunday, Israeli prosecutors indicted Amiram Ben-Uliel, 21, for a firebomb attack last July that killed three members of a Palestinian family in the West Bank village of Duma. A fourth member of the family, a five-year-old child, is still in hospital recovering, while an unnamed Israeli minor has been charged with accessory to murder for assisting Ben-Uliel.

The Duma terror incident, along with video footage from late December that showed Israeli wedding-goers celebrating the attack, left most Israelis horrified, much in the same way as the kidnapping and murder of 16-year-old Palestinian Mohammed Abu Khdeir by Jewish extremists in July 2014 did. Those incidents, plus a series of lower-grade attacks by Israeli youths, prove that the Jewish state has a terror problem of its own that needs to be addressed.

Though the numbers of young people associated with these cells remains small – by most accounts, there are perhaps only a few dozen willing and able to plan and carry out attacks – the potential damage they might cause, in terms of human lives and Israel's image worldwide, is great. The indicting of Ben-Uliel, and a simultaneous series of arrests, are important steps in stopping these dangerous Jewish extremists.

Even so, it is hard to see at this early point how this year might end up being different from the one just completed. The dual hope of peace and security seems like a distant dream, the gulf between Israel and the Palestinians appears unbridgeable, and the tenor of the Israel dialogue – in the Diaspora, too – shows increasing signs of anger and ferocity.

Of all those, the last appears to be the most easily solvable, since it is a purely internal problem. At our most vulnerable moments, we ought to be able to talk – and listen – to each other with respect. That's something we all might resolve to work on this year. It could make a big difference. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

How investing in the Diaspora helps strengthen Israel

Michael Diamond

In a recent column, CJN editor Yoni Goldstein raised eight important questions for Canadian Jews to ponder. One of them was: "At the heart of Diaspora Jewry is the need to balance support for Israel and the health of our own communities. Should we be focusing more on Israel? Or is the growth of Judaism in the Diaspora an equal imperative?"

Those of us who enjoy the benefits that come from giving of our time and dollars to others also know the challenges and responsibilities that come with those benefits. The challenge of choice – the unlimited choice that exists for those of us who care about the world around us, and particularly the Jewish world, which has, in and of itself, virtually unlimited needs.

The powerful pull of Zionism, and the extreme need of the Zionist initiative both before and after the formation of the State of Israel, have overwhelmed the Jewish world for well over a century. The Jewish world necessarily got used to the idea that the ideal of "next year in Jerusalem" needed our support – and if we were not going to be physically available to live the dream of our own state, the next best alternative was to raise or provide money, or both, to enable those who were making that dream a reality. Giving to Israel –whether through the local federation, the Jewish National Fund, the Jewish Agency or a host of other charities that sprang up to focus on the specific needs of the nascent state – became a wonderful habit.

Meanwhile, back at home in the Diaspora, our communities, particularly in North America, prospered beyond any expectations we would have had a century ago. Having had the opportunity to operate freely amongst our neighbours, we learned that we could live the good Jewish Diaspora life if we worked hard, obeyed the law and supported each other.

But in the last several decades, much has changed, both in Israel and in our Diaspora communities. Israel has become one of the fastest growing countries in the world. Its status as the "startup nation" has become legendary. Its economic health is strong, its standard of living reasonably high and improving. Despite its many existential threats, life in Israel now is treasured by most.

Paradoxically, the Diaspora communities are now facing threats to our communities associated with our total acceptance by the broader communities we enjoy. Questions of Jewish identity and intermarriage, as well as the lack of religiosity, have become existential to the long-term strength of our communities. In addition, all of our Jewish institutions – whether they be synagogues, day schools, Jewish camps or social service agencies – are short of money. Many in our communities live below the poverty line. Our seniors, including Holocaust survivors, are in need of support.

In my view, the question of where we ought to invest our time and dollars should be answered by considering how we can best strengthen the Jewish People, a people that is comprised of many Diaspora communities, together with Israel at our centre.

In my regular association with members of the shinshinim program – comprised of 18-year-old Israelis who visit Toronto for a year of public service – I am often asked why, if I love Israel so much, I do not make aliyah. The answer to that question is similar to the answer I believe applies to the question raised at the beginning of this column – that is, I can do more for the Jewish People, and therefore for Israel, while living in the Diaspora, where I can make a good living that allows me to support Jewish (and non-Jewish) causes, and build strength in Israel through building strength in our Jewish community.

Ultimately, Israel cannot survive on its own in this world. Like all of us, Israel needs friends – friends with influence, and friends who care. Friends who send money, and friends who raise money. Friends who advocate for Israel, and friends who visit. After all, the Jewish People is every one of us – whether we live in Israel, or in the Diaspora. And to the extent that we build the stronger Jewish communities, whether in Toronto or Los Angeles or Tel Aviv, we are strengthening the Jewish People as a whole.

If we need both the Diaspora and Israel – and I believe that we do – then our obligation is to support both, or, more accurately, to support the Jewish People by investing in our local communities, in Israel and in organizations that strengthen both. That is what federations and other organizations do. They allocate significant funds to Israel, while large amounts stay at home to build our own communities, which in turn allow those communities to continue to support Israel, both financially and as a good friend.

Without building the Jewish communities of the Diaspora today, we cannot hope to continue to support Israel tomorrow. In the long run, an investment in the Diaspora enables ongoing investment in Israel and the Jewish People. ■

Vancouver's Jewish scene filled with new faces

The community is undergoing rapid change, but adjustment isn't always easy for newcomers

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Despite the high cost of living in British Columbia, the face of Vancouver's Jewish community is changing rapidly, with 36 per cent of its population born outside of Canada – the largest percentage in the country.

In the Grade 1 classroom at Richmond Jewish Day School (RJDS), half of the class speaks English as a second language, with students hailing from Israel and Argentina and speaking a mixture of Hebrew, Russian and Spanish.

"There's definitely a growing number of Israeli families in all our Jewish day schools," said Abba Brodt, principal at RJDS. Among them is the second wave of Russian Jews consisting of Russian emigres who made aliyah as children and moved to Vancouver after doing army service in Israel and starting their families.

"They maintain strong Russian ties, but have an incredibly strong connection to Judaism and Israel," he said.

The new arrivals place extra demands on Jewish day schools in terms of meeting their children's language needs, and RJDS has had to shift resources internally so children of new immigrants can learn successfully in class.

"When people come, what's our obligation to them?" Brodt said. "They want their kids to get a Jewish education as they get established. Many of these parents come without jobs, are not established financially and are trying to adjust, but it takes many, many years. The only menschlich thing to do is to open our doors, figure it out and let them know they're not a burden at all. I think that's the right approach for any Jewish organization in town. The faster we help them get on their feet, the better for the community."

Adjustment is easiest for the youngest children. Brodt recalled a Russian Israeli family that arrived in June 2014 with a kid who couldn't speak a word of English. "He entered kindergarten, and by December that year, he was speaking to his parents outside of school hours, in English!"

At Vancouver Talmud Torah (VTT), head of school Cathy Lowenstein has also witnessed an influx of new immigrants from Israel, Brazil and this year from Estonia and Hungary.

"For students in the younger grades, ESL support isn't as much of an issue, as they can really immerse themselves in language much faster than students in intermediate grades. But over the past few years, we've increasingly had to allocate budget to students who require ESL support," she said

That can be difficult to do, because ESL needs vary year by year. "Often these students don't present until late summer, so we're left trying to reallocate dollars in August so that we can properly help them transition into the school."

Tuition assistance is provided on a case-by-case basis, and by August, VTT has already allocated close to $2 million in assistance, Lowenstein said. "Even though we may have allocated our cap, we do our very best not to turn away a family wanting a Jewish education."

Before they arrive, Jewish families have researched the Lower Mainland's Jewish schools carefully, both Brodt and Lowenstein agree, and a small percentage shop around to find the school where they can get the cheapest tuition price.

"They won't get that at VTT," Lowenstein said. "It costs money to deliver programming, and most newly arrived families recognize that. They don't always know what they'll do for work when they arrive or where they'll live, but their primary goal is to enrol their kids in school first and everything else will work itself out."

Newcomers are attracted to Vancouver by the quality of life, says Ezra Shanken, CEO of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV).

"Today's immigration is driven by quality. We see a great deal of quality here in Vancouver. That's why we see that the large numbers of Israelis who are coming are... motivated by the fact that Vancouver is ranked high in places to raise your kids," Shanken said.

"They and other new Jewish immigrants are coming because this is a great place to raise your kids. Not everyone is coming here with money, but... for all the challenges of affordability in Vancouver, this is still an extraordinary place to live and is attracting really amazing people who want to be here."

And even with the expense of living in British Columbia's Lower Mainland, the area's Jewish population grew 14.2 per cent between 2001 and 2011, Shelley Rivkin, the JFGV vice-president for planning, allocations and community affairs, told The CJN in 2014. "That's a faster increase than any other city in Canada, and our population is now at 26,750."

Nevertheless, financial pressures are indeed having far-reaching effects on the Jews who call this corner of the West Coast home. Approximately 14,000 of them live in Vancouver, close to 6,000 in Richmond and the remainder in outlying cities such as Burnaby, New Westminster, Port Coquitlam, Coquitlam, Port Moody, Maple Ridge and Langley – where Jewish resources are few and far between.

Canadian Jews could use their own Mohawk Girls show

David Weinfeld

Bailey, a proud Mohawk, finds it difficult to find a native husband while living on the Kahnawake reserve in Quebec. She moves to Montreal and meets Aaron, who is offering a homeless man some food.

"That was really nice of you," she remarks.

"Tikkun olam," he replies. "It's Hebrew for repairing the world."

Bailey and Aaron go out on a date and compare their equally overbearing Mohawk and Jewish parents pressuring them to marry within the tribe. After they sleep together, Bailey jokes about their families meeting. Aaron, however, spoils the party. "This is just fun, nothing more. I could never date someone who is not Jewish."

These scenes take place on Mohawk Girls, an entertaining comedy-drama set in Kahnawake. Featuring a largely First Nations cast and airing on the Aboriginal Peoples Television Network, Mohawk Girls criticizes colonialism and confronts the very real problems aboriginals face, including poverty, racism, alcoholism and violence. It recounts the horrors of the residential schools and the missing indigenous women. But it also celebrates First Nations culture, community, diversity and individuality.

Tracey Deer, the show's creator and executive producer who grew up in Kahnawake, describes it as "Sex and the City for the native set." The show chronicles four young women looking for love and sex on and off the reserve as they debate whether to date only Mohawk men.

Despite its unfamiliar setting, Mohawk Girls deals with themes deeply familiar to Canadian Jewry. In the above episode, Bailey's family wonders whether Jews are white. They can't decide, but are certain that Jews are not Mohawk. Indeed, differences between the two peoples are vast. Though both groups suffered genocide and systematic persecution, today most Jews are economically successful and well integrated into Canadian society, while First Nations communities face far bleaker realities. Nonetheless, both Mohawks and Jews fight to preserve their cultures in the face of assimilation.

The parallels go beyond intermarriage. Another character in Mohawk Girls, Anna, was born to a Mohawk father and white mother. She grew up in New York and returns to the reserve to rediscover her heritage. Anna struggles for acceptance in Kahnawake, just as Jews of patrilineal descent see their Judaism questioned by some in the Jewish community. Many Mohawks are obsessed with blood quantum, an American-imposed system for determining aboriginal purity highly reminiscent of the Nazis' Nuremberg Race Laws.

Anna's attempts to fit in reveal the cultural genocide her people suffered. When she takes Mohawk language classes, Bailey explains that only one per cent of First Nations can speak their native tongue. Jews in the Diaspora face similar struggles maintaining Hebrew. When Anna mentions a native ritual, a friend sharply notes that she was raised Catholic, but that does not make her less Mohawk. Jews, too, wonder if their identity is religious, cultural or ethnic.

These shared struggles run through the series. As Montrealer Cynthia Knight, the Mohawk Girls' head writer, told the McGill Daily: "I'm Jewish, and my whole life was about, 'do I continue and stay in the faith because my family wants me to? Do I marry a Jewish guy because of all the sacrifices my ancestors made? If I don't keep it up my people will disappear.' These are exactly the questions the ladies have to ask themselves in the show."

Canadian Jews could use their own version of Mohawk Girls, a show that is thoroughly Jewish, proud but self-critical, a show that confronts assimilation and cultural survival head on. Like Mohawk Girls, it could feature characters dedicated to the community who maintain their individuality and refuse to succumb to stereotypes.

One can even imagine a protagonist who leaves her synagogue and meets a Mohawk mensch. ■

Learning from Limmud

Daniel Held

In England, winter break is Limmud season. Each year, more than 2,500 learners of all ages descend on the U.K. Limmud conference to engage in activities and lectures spanning the full spectrum of Jewish learning. This year, Limmud celebrated its 35th anniversary. In that time, it has formed the basis for an international movement, marking a new form of Jewish learning and engagement now active in more than 80 communities worldwide.

Limmud was once referred to as British Jewry's greatest export. While I might argue that my British-born mother should hold that title, Limmud has created a compelling model of Jewish education that successfully addresses the needs of a new generation of learners. The underpinnings of this model can serve as an important example for other settings of learning and engagement.

First, Limmud is driven by volunteers rather than professionals. The constantly revolving core of volunteers, who are largely in their 20s and 30s, has ensured that the organization regularly reinvents itself, remaining relevant to a changing audience and changing needs. In some ways, this base of young leaders resembles the youth movement activism of the past. What's more, the generations of Limmud volunteer alumni have started to reshape the face of British Jewry. The United Kingdom's "40 under 40" list of future Jewish leaders consistently features Limmud volunteers. Today, Limmud organizers throughout the world can network with one another, sharing experience and expertise. For these individuals, Limmud is a critical and ongoing form of Jewish engagement, stretching well beyond the event they are organizing.

Second, Limmud is designed for "prosumers" – a generation that seeks to both consume and produce experiences. Everyone is involved in creating Limmud. Beyond the organizing volunteers, presenters at Limmud are largely drawn from participants who respond to an open call for sessions. In most conferences, the ratio of presenters to participants is quite low, indicating the high level of engagement. Similarly, the conferences themselves are brought to life by "Limmud makers" – individuals who offer time at the conference in return for reduced fees. In some way, everyone at Limmud is both a producer and consumer of the experience.

Third, Limmud is not institutionally bound. While it draws on institutional leaders, it bucks the trend of institutional collaboration, often characterized by each partner including its own logo and criteria for content and structure. Rather, Limmud maintains a non-institutional identity. Part of balking at the institutional yoke, Limmud operates in public spaces. Conferences take place on university campuses and in public schools, places with lower barriers to entry than synagogues and yeshivot.

Fourth, Limmud is multi-generational. The program usually includes activities geared to kids, teens and adults as well as cross-aged programming. By opening itself to children of all ages, Limmud enables parents to mix family time with personal growth. For many young families, Limmud is like camp with programming both separate and together.

Fifth, Limmud works on our schedule. Limmud was originally conceived of as a response to the December dilemma – while our neighbours celebrate Christmas, Jews gathered for their own celebration. Beyond a Christmas alternative, it's scheduled at a time when school is closed, work is slow and families can vacation.

Finally, Limmud is replicable, but not mirrored. In 2015, there were 66 Limmud events run by 3,000 volunteers with 33,000 participants in more than 50 communities from New York to New Zealand, China to across Canada. While the core values of Limmud remain common across various settings, the program is unique to each community and shaped by individual volunteers and participants.

Limmud's growth stands in contrast to waning participation in many legacy forms of Jewish engagement. It's worth our while to consider what lessons we can learn from this relatively new start-up on the Jewish educational stage. ■

Cast me not away in my old age

Jean M. Gerber

Every year we recite Kaddish for our parents – also for friends who have died without someone to say it for them. We recall their hopes and dreams, and what they meant to us. We reflect on how they died – not from what diseases, but the process by which they came to the end of their lives. Not always pretty.

This year, I celebrated my 75th birthday. I am older than many of my close relatives and friends were when they died. Our generation, beneficiaries of medical advances our parents could only wish for, however, has yet to discover a way to close off our lives.

Both my husband and I had widowed grandmothers living with us. Few people contemplated tucking their parents away in a "home." Children were supposed to take care of parents. That is no longer the assumption. Despite good intentions, finding an "appropriate level of care" in an institution has shifted the traditional way of caring for the aging from a personal to an institutional one.

So, when a dear friend (thank you, G.Y.) told us to read Being Mortal: Medicine and What Matters in the End by Dr. Atul Gawande, it opened up the conversation on a completely new level.

I really, really want this man to be my doctor when I get to the stage of needing help. Failing that, the lessons learned from his book will certainly be incorporated into whatever decisions our family makes when the time comes.

Gawande describes the history of the nursing home, now called assisted living or long-term care facility, euphemisms for what is in essence a place where we go to live out our time once we can (supposedly) no longer "manage on our own."

I do not denigrate these facilities; they can be light and airy places with trained staff and caring professionals. But, Gawande points out, too often they are run on a schedule and with expectations that emphasize safety, routine and top-down management of the residents. Too often, residents have little say as to what would make their lives truly livable.

> What do we want out of the end of our lives?

What do we want out of the end of our lives? When we are creaky but still well, ask us what would make us happy, not just safe. When we are dying, help us to manage that.

The rise of hospice has been a great boon, although that option will soon be overwhelmed by the boomer bulge. Home care? Again, public resources are just not there to meet the needs.

These are topics Gawande addresses, giving brave examples from his own life as well as from those of some of his patients. And here I give a shout-out to the nurse practitioner (in the chapter "Hard Conversations"), a newer art that we should hope will be part of future health care at many levels.

One of the great temptations as we near the end is to hope medical science will somehow see us through, that there is always another treatment, remedy, pill, that will cure, or at least mediate, our disease. Recall that I said we have treatments that our parents could only dream of.

But maybe there is a wiser way.

Gawande writes: "if to be human is to be limited, then the role of caring professions and institutions... ought to be aiding people in their struggle with these limits. Sometimes we can offer a cure, sometimes a salve, sometimes not even that. But whatever we can offer, our interventions and the risks and sacrifices they entail, are justified only if they serve the larger aims of a person's life. When we forget that, the suffering we inflict can be barbaric. When we remember it, the good we do can be breathtaking."

We pray: "Cast me not away in my old age." I pray that our own community will take to heart the lessons of this book, sift its messages and hear its wisdom. ■

Can Israel and Turkey establish full diplomatic relations?

Paul Michaels

As 2015 came to a close, the only good news, potentially, to come out of the Middle East was that Turkey and Israel were trying to re-establish full diplomatic relations.

It'll be interesting to see if Turkey's self-interest will prevail over President Recep Erdogan's habitual hostility to the Jewish state.

Relations had deteriorated since 2002, when then-Turkish prime minister Erdogan and his Islamist-oriented AK Party rose to power. With his roots in the Muslim Brotherhood, Erdogan was not only hostile to Israel, he was anti-Semitic. Relations spiralled into total crisis in 2010, when Israeli commandos, acting in self-defence, killed nine Turks aboard the Mavi Mamara, the lead ship of the Turkish flotilla trying to breach Israel's legal naval blockade of the Gaza Strip.

In 2013, in an effort to break the impasse in Turkish-Israeli relations, U.S. President Barak Obama prevailed upon Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to apologize for "any error that may have led to the loss of life." Contrary to Obama's expectations but consistent with his (Obama's) misreading of the region, Erdogan, intransigent as ever, refused to reciprocate Netanyahu's magnanimous gesture (magnanimous since Israel felt it had nothing to apologize for).

In the meantime, Turkey was becoming more isolated in the Middle East. Turkey had alienated Egypt after preaching to it and other Arab countries about being a role model for democratic reform. Ankara did so while imprisoning scores of journalists and generally clamping down on free speech. Erdogan expressed open hostility to former friend and major trading partner Syrian President Bashar Assad after Assad attacked his own people and caused a Syrian refugee crisis in Turkey.

In mid-December, as Erdogan threatened to "annihilate" Kurdish militants, many based in northern Iraq, the Arab League condemned a Turkish troop deployment in Iraq as an "assault" on the country's sovereignty.

Then came what was perhaps the most serious diplomatic setback for Turkey – Erdogan's decision to shoot down a Russian bomber that had made a 17-second incursion into Turkish airspace. One bully, Erdogan, had taken on another, even greater bully, Russian President Vladimir Putin, who had just a short while earlier moved major Russian military assets into Syria in order to prop up his brutal ally Assad and secure Russia's naval base at the Syrian port of Tartus.

While acting short of military retaliation against Turkey, a furious Putin imposed sanctions against his former friend. Turkey currently gets over half its gas from Russia and has substantial trade agreements with Moscow.

But now Turkey is looking to Israel, which is developing massive gas fields off its Mediterranean coast, as a possible supplier – and partial replacement for Russia – once pipelines are built into Turkey.

This is the sort of practical, mutually beneficial economic deal that would help shore up ties between Israel and Turkey. Nonetheless, Russia, which has good relations with the Jewish state, but which badly needs all the revenues it can generate from its gas and oil sales, would almost certainly not be pleased by Israel's incursion into its markets.

As this column is being written in late December, there are reports that Erdogan, characteristically, is throwing other obstacles at Israel, insisting that Israel end its blockade of Gaza before relations can move ahead. While this has long been one of Erdogan's demands, there were indications that Turkey, a NATO member, would end its overt support of Hamas, foremost its being home to a faction of Hamas' "military wing" led by Saleh al-Aruri that, among other things, is trying to establish terror cells in the West Bank.

Yet, in another act of defiance against Israel, Erdogan just recently feted Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal in Turkey.

It's sheer hypocrisy for Erdogan to support a terrorist organization dedicated to Israel's destruction while he ruthlessly attacks Turkey's own Kurds (200,000 of whom have been displaced in the last few months in the south-eastern part of the country), and who are demanding nothing other than autonomy. ■

Religious Zionist leaders condemn 'wedding of hate'

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Jewish wedding revellers celebrate the murder of a Palestinian family. CHANNEL 10 SCREENSHOT

Religious Zionist leaders in Canada have joined the chorus of condemnation against Jerusalem revellers featured in video footage, released Dec. 23 by Israel's Channel 10, of what has been dubbed by some media outlets as the "wedding of hate."

The video, which has since been confiscated by Israeli police, shows mostly young Jewish men in traditional religious garb dancing at the wedding of a religious couple while waving rifles, pistols, knives and Molotov cocktails.

One masked man can be seen stabbing a photograph of Ali Dawabsheh, the Palestinian toddler who was killed along with his parents in a firebomb attack on their home in the Palestinian village of Duma last July. The attack is thought to have been orchestrated by members of an extremist right-wing group living in the hilltops of the West Bank.

A number of people in the video, including the groom, were arrested by Israeli police last week.

Israeli politicians across the spectrum, numerous religious Zionist rabbis in Israel and the president of the Orthodox movement's Rabbinical Council of America have expressed disgust at the video, and Canadian rabbis and religious Zionist leaders are also distancing themselves from those involved.

"We condemn all violence that is portrayed in that video. It doesn't represent the mainstream religious Zionist community," said Jonny Lipczer, director of Bnei Akiva of Toronto, the local branch of the youth movement affiliated with the religious Zionist Mizrachi movement.

He stressed that the men shown celebrating in the video don't reflect Jewish values. "I don't think any moderate-thinking Jew would identify with what that video represents."

He's seen no evidence of this type of extremism being alive in Canada, he said, adding that Bnei Akiva believes in finding solutions to the conflict in Israel "through dialogue and discussion rather than violence."

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto said that "any celebration of violence against innocence is absolutely unconscionable in our tradition. I, as every rabbinic leader you speak to in Toronto, will condemn this celebration of wanton violence against innocents."

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, the largest Orthodox congregation in Canada, was the most strident in his response, saying, "I'm horrified that there's a ring of religious Zionists in the world that believe terrorism against people – especially children – is justifiable and worthy of celebration. It needs to be condemned in the loudest of terms… there's no room whatsoever for terrorism in the Jewish world."

Even among the most right-wing elements of the Canadian Jewish community, he hasn't heard anywhere near this sort of incitement to violence, he said.

Rabbi Korobkin added that he was considering discussing the ethics and morals of combating terrorism and "the proper ethics of facing your enemy" during a Shabbat morning sermon.

No matter how obvious it may seem that a group of people or congregants abhor terrorism, it's important for Jewish leaders to address these issues in the community and to condemn terrorism in the strongest and most explicit of terms, he said.

"Sometimes when the challenge is put forth to members of the Islamic community to condemn [Islamic] terrorism, they'll say, 'My brand of Islam isn't associated with terrorism, so why should I condemn groups like ISIS and other wackos?' But the truth is, the latter are doing what they do in the name of Islam. Just as we want moderate Muslims to distance themselves from that behaviour, we in the Jewish community have to do the same thing. If it's not said overtly, we're not fulfilling our responsibility." ■

Toronto deli Ben & Izzy's closed again after fire

Restaurant had only been open for about a month after being shuttered since the summer

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

After being closed for much of the summer and most of the fall, retro kosher deli Ben & Izzy's will be closed again "for a few months" following a fire at the restaurant.

According to a spokesperson for Toronto Fire Services, a call came in on Dec. 28 at 12:43 p.m. about a fire in the deli's basement.

He said the blaze was categorized as a two-alarm basement fire, which resulted in 12 fire trucks and 45 firefighters being dispatched to the scene. The fire was put out by 1:14 p.m.

While no injuries were reported, he said he couldn't speak to whether people were in the restaurant, located on Bathurst Street south of Wilson Avenue, at the time the fire broke out, and he had no information about the fire's cause at this time.

"Everyone is fine. Deli is not," read a tweet from the Ben & Izzy's Twitter account at 2:43 p.m. on Dec. 28. About an hour later, another tweet read, "Deli went up in smoke this afternoon. Not sure when we will be reopened. No injuries, but the basement went up in flames."

On Dec. 29, the restaurant tweeted and posted on its Facebook page, "Sad to say, but it looks like we're out of commission for a few months."

Ben & Izzy's owners Ben Venasio and Izzy Bernath did not respond to The CJN's multiple attempts to reach them.

The restaurant, which first opened in 2013, was known in the Toronto kosher community for its old-school delicatessen approach to meats, which were handcured and smoked daily on site.

In late July, the deli posted on social media that it would be "closed for summer." A month later, this message was posted on its Twitter account: "I was going to reopen, but since closing, brisket prices went up an additional 1.50 since July. That's a $6 increase in 1.5 years."

The CJN tried to reach the owners at that time, but they would not respond to phone calls, emails or Facebook messages.

In September and October, several postings on the deli's social media accounts announced upcoming dates for its reopening, but they were ultimately postponed, and the restaurant didn't reopen until the middle of November.

> Business wasn't as good as people think it was.

Tzvi Hirschman, the owner of Toronto Kosher, a kosher butcher and grocery located in the same plaza as Ben & Izzy's, said he saw fire trucks outside the deli the day of the fire, but didn't speak to the owners or any of the employees, and his own store was not affected.

He noted that since it reopened recently, the deli was only open in the evening hours for dinner, and not during the day for lunch.

"Business was slow. Business wasn't as good as people think it was," Hirschman said. ■

New digital project highlights Canadian social movements

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Elisa Birnbaum spoke to former prime minister Paul Martin about marriage equality.

SEE Change Magazine editor Elisa Birnbaum said she hopes the multimedia project she produced, which explores Canadian history through the lens of 10 20th-century social change movements, will help Canadians have a better understanding of where they come from and where they're heading.

The Canadian History of Social Change encompasses an e-book, digital stories, and video interviews about 10 social movements including aboriginal rights, multiculturalism and immigration, suffrage, the environmental movement, marriage equality, social entrepreneurship – or aligning economic activities with social values – and health care.

Birnbaum explained that when she learned last year that Heritage Canada, a government organization that awards grants to publications, was looking for historical content, she saw an opportunity to do something big.

"It was perfect because I was already sort of delving into the whole concept of social change and social movements and how they've impacted Canada and how it impacts who we are today. I was already looking into that stuff so when they put up this call for historical-based projects, I thought, well that's perfect," Birnbaum said.

Among those featured in the multimedia project is former prime minister Paul Martin, with whom Birnbaum explored the issue of marriage equality, as well as former Chief of Tsawwassen First Nation Kim Baird who has worked to help Canada's Aboriginal communities move towards empowerment and self-governance.

"We looked at the evolution of the social movement and how it adapted and changed things," she said.

She said they chose to focus on social movements from the 20th century onward because "if we looked at social movements prior to that we'd be drowning" in material.

"That is the reason we only focused on 10 social movements. There could have been 20… narrowing it down to 10 was difficult… As we moved forward, we realized that there was so much more we could be doing. If we get more funding, I could see it developing into something bigger. And in terms of that interactive element, educational element, I see that it could evolve," Birnbaum added.

"I still feel like it's a work in progress… the videos and digital stories and podcasts are all sitting on their own on a micro site called a HistoryofSocialChange.ca."

She said for each chapter, or each movement featured in the book, there are two digital stories.

"At the end there is a link that takes you back to the main website, where you can see video interviews, podcasts, and things like that."

Birnbaum said that the project, in addition to the ongoing work she does as editor of SEE Change Magazine, is very much in line with the Jewish concept of tikkun olam.

"I think the whole concept of tikkun olam is important… especially with one of the movements featured about multiculturalism and immigration. I just think it is so timely," she said.

"I think it is important that we understand our environment, and the social movement is a big part of who we are and where we come from. By extension it is a big part of understanding where we want to go next, and the challenges we face. I think Jews have a particular understanding of that. As a community, we know how important it is to remember where we come from, especially as we struggle and look to where we want to go next."

The e-book is available for sale at www.historyofsocialchange.ca, with proceeds going to support Lifeline Syria. ■

Non-profit uses toilets to tackle social issues

JODIE SHUPAC

Marc Soberano says the word "toilet" a lot, but not for the reasons you might think.

Last September, the 25-year-old Toronto entrepreneur, a graduate of Western University's Richard Ivey School of Business, launched a Toronto non-profit that aims to achieve social and environmental change by training workers to retrofit toilets, showers and sinks and at the same time helping affordable housing units reduce their operating costs and consumption.

Building Up, which Soberano modelled on the Winnipeg-based initiative Build, offers a four-month, compensated pre-apprenticeship training and work program to people with barriers to employment, such as poverty or involvement in the criminal justice system.

In addition to in-class instruction in math, financial and general literacy, and some soft skills, participants are taught how to do energy and water efficiency retrofits and are contracted through Building Up to take on supervised jobs in residential low-income housing in Toronto.

Payment from the jobs goes toward hourly wages for the workers, who make $14 per hour for their work and in-class time.

After the four months, Building Up connects trainees with trade unions or employers, who then ideally take them on as apprentices.

"With the trades, you can start as a labourer, then become an apprentice, then a second-level apprentice. There are steps you can keep moving up through and keep earning more. A journeyman, for example, can make about $50 an hour," Soberano explained.

Building Up was one of the recipients of last year's Genesis Generation Challenge, a competition that awarded $100,000 apiece to nine innovative projects that reflect Jewish values.

The competition is an outgrowth of the U.S.-based Genesis Prize, the $1-million so-called "Jewish Nobel," designed to reward Jewish leaders who exemplify Jewish values. Former New York mayor Michael Bloomberg was its inaugural recipient.

"This money has allowed us to figure things out in our first year. It's given us wiggle room to pay people and deliver training," Soberano said.

Marc Soberano

Building Up finds its trainees through the Learning Enrichment Foundation (LEF), a local organization that matches marginalized people with skills training and employment.

In teams of three and under the supervision of Building Up's resident master plumber Paul McCullough, trainees start by reviewing a building's water bills and then taking measurements of toilets, shower heads and faucets to figure out how energy consumption can be reduced.

They then give the building manager a free report on the cost of retrofitting and what eventual savings will look like.

"If they don't have the money to pay us up front, we offer them to pay nothing at first and pay us back over time through the savings they generate on their water bills," Soberano said, stressing that he wants to make Building Up as accessible as possible.

So far, the non-profit has trained about seven people and worked on 11 different buildings, which Soberano said translates to a total of just over 1,000 retrofitted toilets and a collective savings of about 70 million litres of water each year.

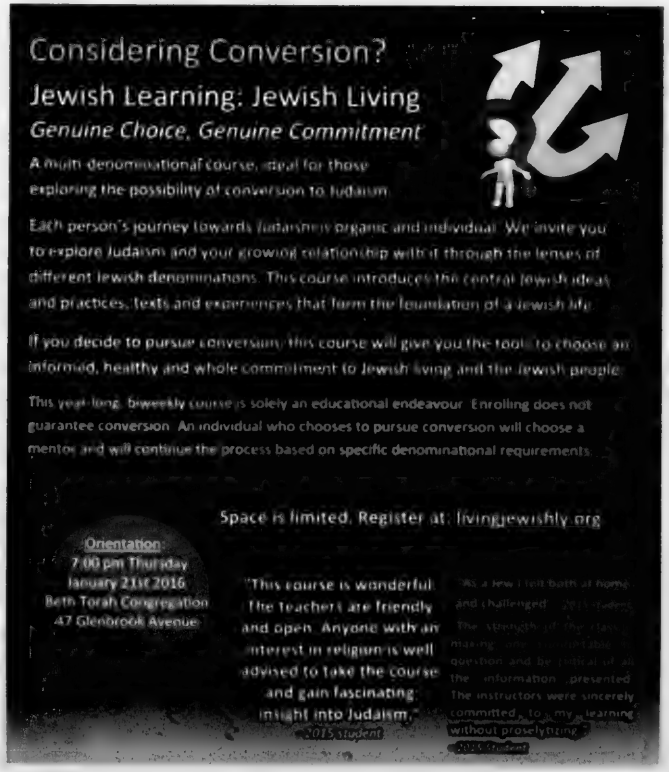
"Any building, even ones that recently got new toilets, can do this upgrade, and it'll pay for itself through the savings in well under three years. We just did a building that'll now save $90,0000 each year on water bills," Soberano said.

As the organization grows, it plans to expand its operations. So far, the classes, held on LEF's premises, have been taught by Soberano and McCullough themselves, based on materials they've pieced together from several educational partner organizations. A new grant from Ontario's Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities, however, will enable Soberano to hire a training manager and streamline lessons.

As well, Building Up has already started to broaden its services beyond plumbing to general trades projects that benefit the community: a team of trainees renovated a kitchen at The 519 community centre in the Church and Wellesley area of Toronto, and it's currently doing bathroom renovations at the downtown Centre for Social Innovation, a shared work space for social entrepreneurs.

Trainee Divaldo Miguel, 28, has worked on about 10 buildings with Building Up. He was recently accepted to a training program with the Labourers' Local 506 union.

"Not only do we get paid for what we do, but we get to work as a team and learn new skills. I had no experience before this when it came to plumbing, and now we've learned a little bit of everything, like how to use different tools – it's been a really good experience," he said. ■



Considering Conversion?

Maccabi Canada basketball team makes history in Chile

Although the Maccabi Canada delegation at this year's Pan American Maccabi Games is just a fraction of the size of the 2011 contingent, it made history last week.

For the first time in Maccabi Canada's history, the open men's basketball team beat the American team in its second game of the tournament in Santiago, Chile, which ran from Dec. 26 to Jan. 5.

Tali Dubrovsky, Maccabi Canada's national executive director, said the U.S. basketball delegation traditionally dominates the competition, leaving the Canadians to compete for the silver or bronze, but with a 82-75 win against the Americans early in the tournament, the Canadian team set its sights on the gold medal.

Ave Bross, a 22-year-old Thornhill native who played four years as point guard on McGill University's varsity team and is currently participating in his fifth Maccabi Games, is one of the team's star players.

After a disappointing seventh-place finish at the Maccabiah Games in Israel in 2013, Bross said, "our expectation for this team is to get the gold. That's what we're here for.

"We had a tough start. We lost to Argentina in the first game by three, in a game that was difficult, and we definitely didn't play our best, but since then, we've been playing really well and really hungry, and we pulled off that win against the United States by seven," said Bross, who served as flag-bearer for the Canadian team during the opening ceremonies.

In their third game, Bross said they came out early with a 20-point lead and didn't look back, beating the Guatemalan team by 42 points.

Basketball is one of only two sports in these games that Canadians were competing in. The entire Maccabi delegation included 20 athletes, compared to the 175 athletes who travelled to Brazil for the games in 2011.

Dubrovsky blamed the weak Canadian dollar for the last-minute cancellations that resulted in a smaller team.

In addition to the basketball team, Maccabi Canada was also represented by a masters tennis team, consisting of 44-year-old Anton Rabie and 40-year-old Lauren Liverman.

Following a win in his first set in the singles tournament to a Chilean player, and a loss to the gold medal-winner from the last PanAm games in Sao Paulo, Rabie was eliminated from the tournament.

Liverman won her first two matches, which qualified her for the semi-finals in the singles tournament, and both Rabie and Liverman were gearing up to play in the mixed doubles tournament at the time this article was written.

Rabie said that although the Maccabi Games are about competition, that's just one aspect of it.

"The magic of this trip has been bringing the kids to Chile and having them meet Jewish kids from around the world and having a magical, warm experience," said Rabie, who brought his wife and three daughters, aged nine to 12, to Chile with him.

"Santiago has a really warm Jewish community. It's like the Winnipeg Jewish community. It's about 15,000 people and there is so much warmth and so much spirit," he added.

"When you leave North America, the first thing you learn is the comfort you have with Jews around the world and you realize that you're all from the same place. The Maccabi Games really does deliver on what they say, which is exposing Jewish kids to Zionism around the world."

Maccabi Canada president Tommy Bacher explained that for the countries that host the Pan Am games, it's an opportunity for them to engage with other Jewish communities.

"It allows them to mobilize and involve their Jewish communities, which, oftentimes feel pretty isolated from the rest of the Jewish world, in something that is Zionist, and certainly spreads the message of Jewish solidarity throughout the world," Bacher said.

"We have communities from Israel, Australia, Great Britain, South Africa, as well as the South American countries and the United States and Canada. I think there are 21 countries represented here, and about 2,300 athletes."

For Bross, the Maccabi Games, in which he's participated since he was 14, have contributed positively to his Jewish identity.

"Judaism is important to me and sport is a passion of mine, and the fact that this is a combination of the two is unbelievable," he said. ■

Jews and Christmas: a bad match

Rabbi Michael Skobac

I know it's dicey to write a critical reflection on Jews embracing Christmas. Hearing the inevitable chorus of "intolerant Scrooge" certainly gives me pause. But seeing a piece in The CJN this winter holiday season by Michael Taube ("Jews and Christmas: enjoy the holiday," Dec. 17) urging fellow Jews to celebrate the wrong holiday was too painful to ignore.

My concern here is not, as Taube argues, an "obtuse hang-up" about Christmas. In a world where ideas, beliefs and religious expression have real meaning, it's simply disingenuous to ignore those intrinsic definitions and replace them with whatever just feels cozy. Christmas is not a universal wintertime celebration of gift-giving, lights and tree-decorating. It's a Christian holiday celebrating the birth of Jesus, the Christian Messiah. But by all Jewish standards, Jesus was not the Messiah.

The magnetic attraction of Christmas for some Jewish people is not hard to understand in light of Prof. Solomon Asch's conformity experiments of the 1950s and Maimonides' dictum that people are profoundly influenced by their surroundings. There is likely an inverse relationship between the strength of this pull and the degree to which Jews identify with the core teachings of Judaism.

To be sure, tolerance of others is an incredibly vital trait, one that we should strive to cultivate within ourselves and our children. But is there a need to embrace the religious traditions of other faiths in order to be tolerant and respectful? That can only happen when we no longer have respect for our own values and heritage. We can only embrace everything if we ourselves stand for nothing.

The propensity to get detoured to foreign spiritual pastures is a litmus test indicating that we're just about running on empty. There is a well-known story of an accident that took place at a railroad crossing. A train crashed into a car, severely injuring the driver. He eventually sued the train company. At the trial, the signalman testified that he had given the driver ample warning by waving his lantern back and forth for nearly a minute. The court believed his story, and the suit was dismissed. Afterward, the signalman was congratulated for his testimony and doing so well under cross-examination. He winced and replied, "I was afraid he was going to ask if my lantern was lit!"

> Christmas is not a universal wintertime celebration of gift-giving, lights and tree-decorating.

The dynamic light of Judaism has fuelled the survival of our people for more than 3,000 years. Distilled in the wisdom of the Torah, this light has numerous hues that have resonated with our people in various ways. Some are drawn to its mysticism and pathways to developing a personal relationship with God. Others are attracted to its practical wisdom and guidance on personal and spiritual refinement. People of great idealism have been fueled by the Torah's vision of tikkun olam – perfecting the world. But without a passionate connection to our indigenous light, we are apt to be drawn elsewhere.

Rabbi Kalman Kalonymous Shapira, martyred in the Warsaw Ghetto, presciently expressed this in his small volume Tzav V'Ziruz: "The soul of each person loves to feel. The soul yearns not only for feelings of joy, but will also be drawn to morose and terrifying feelings. Emotion is as much a need of the soul as food is to the body. The person who fulfils this need with passionate prayer and study is nourishing their soul properly. But prayer and study without emotion will leave a vacuum that will drive the soul to search for emotion anywhere – even in inappropriate places."

Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotzk used to quip that he didn't avoid doing the wrong thing because it was wrong, but because there was no time. And Christmas is a holiday that Jews shouldn't have time for. ■

Rabbi Michael Skobac is the director of education and counselling for Jews for Judaism Canada.

Reconstructionist shul sponsors four Syrian families

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Ensemble Zaman will play traditional Syrian music at a benefit concert for refugees.

When members of Congregation Dorshei Emet began talking in the fall about sponsoring Syrian refugees, Laurie Usheroff was doubtful the small synagogue would be able to raise enough money for even one family.

She has happily been proven wrong – the congregation, also known as the Reconstructionist Synagogue, has collected enough money to sponsor four families. An application has been submitted to the Quebec government for the first family, and the paperwork should be completed by the end of January for the other three, said Usheroff, who co-chairs the congregation's Syrian Refugee Sponsorship Project with Garry Beitel.

"The response has been overwhelming," she said, and that's been without any formal launch or announcement of the project.

Since the end of October, about 150 donations have been made, most of them from the congregation's membership, which numbers under 500 units.

"We also received cheques from friends, colleagues, and even neighbours who heard what we were doing and wanted to help," Usheroff said. The money often came from people making a real sacrifice, she added.

Dorshei Emet, like all private sponsors, had to have a government-prescribed amount in the bank before making an application. Sponsorships are based on the size of the family and the age of the children. The cost of the shul's selected families ranges from $20,000 to $31,000 each, she said. "They range from a young couple with an infant to a family with three kids."

The families are now living in Lebanon, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, to her knowledge, on their own or perhaps with relatives. "They are not in refugee camps, as far as a I know, but they have been moving around for a while."

Dorshei Emet identified the families through the Syrian Kids Foundation, a Montreal-based non-profit organization created in 2012, initially to build and support a school in Turkey for the children of Syrian refugees. It now provides humanitarian aid to all Syrian refugees regardless of their religion or affiliation.

All four of Dorshei Emet's families have relatives in Montreal, Usheroff said. Some have previously sponsored other relatives and can't afford to bring over others, some simply don't have the means, she said.

The presence of these relatives will be invaluable when, as Usheroff puts it, "the real work begins" of helping the families settle – a 12-month commitment for sponsors.

It's not known when the first family will arrive, but Usheroff expects it will be at least six months from now. All of the families are Muslim, but Usheroff stressed that religion wasn't a factor in their selection. Dorshei Emet did insist the families be aware they were being sponsored by a shul. "They were all very grateful and thanked us profusely," she said. "I think our religion was of as little concern to them as theirs was to us."

Choosing from the refugees the Syrian Kids Foundation provided was difficult for the shul's sponsorship project committee, which has about 18 members. "We selected on the basis of need and who we thought would be successful here," Usheroff said, "but everybody needs help." The livelihoods of those selected vary from pharmacist to engineer to car dealer, she said.

Dorshei Emet has a history of refugee sponsorship. In the 1970s, it was the Vietnamese "boat people" and, two decades later, Latin Americans. "A few members were around when we helped the Vietnamese," Usheroff said.

Congregants will have to mobilize when the Syrians get here, and subcommittees devoted to housing, employment, education and other practical resettlement matters are being formed. "Officially, our responsibility is for 12 months, but possibly it will be longer," she said.

On Jan. 23, Dorshei Emet will hold a "cross-cultural musical celebration" featuring Ensemble Zaman, a local group that plays traditional Syrian music, and the Syrian pianist Mohammad Abdou, who arrived as a refugee in Montreal six months ago, as well as The Musical Chairs, a folk group performing old-style hootenanny. The fundraiser's suggested contribution is $20.

Another local shul is doing its part for refugees. Congregation Adath Israel's Rabbi Michael Whitman said his appeal for clothes and personal care products last month bore fruit. "We had a huge response: several hundred toothbrushes, eight to 10 large garbage bags filled with new winter clothes," he said. "The person collecting for Syrian refugees in Jordan [someone known to the rabbi] could not take everything we collected." ■

Report on discrimination felt by Jews misleading: expert

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A recent government publication that reported half of Jews in Quebec experienced discrimination in the previous five years, more than double the Canadian average, is misleading, according to Jack Jedwab, executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies (ACS).

Coup d'oeil sociodémographique bulletin, numéro 44, by Marie-Andrée Gravel was released by the Institut de la Statistique du Québec in December and is based on data from Statistics Canada's 2013 General Social Survey on all forms of discrimination.

The study notes with concern that 51.4 per cent of Jewish respondents said they had felt discriminated against on the basis of "ethnocultural factors", while in the rest of Canada the figure was 23.6 per cent.

That section is headlined "La communauté juive est davantage touchée par la discrimination au Québec que dans le reste du Canada" ("The Jewish community is affected more by discrimination in Quebec than in the rest of Canada").

Noting that non-Christians in Quebec generally say they feel discriminated against proportionally more than in the rest of the country, the author states: "In this way, close to one person practising Judaism out of two indicated having been the victim of discrimination due to ethno-cultural factors (51 per cent)... It should be noted that ethno-cultural discrimination affects a much higher proportion of the Jewish community in Quebec than in the rest of Canada (51 per cent vs. 24 per cent)."

The report includes a table with these figures compared to other religious and ethnic groups, as well as other categories of respondents by age, visible minority status, language spoken at home, and, for immigrants, year of arrival in Canada.

Among other religions, 39.3 per cent of Muslims and 11.1 per cent of Christians in Quebec said they'd experienced discrimination based on ethno-cultural factors, compared to, respectively, 34.9 per cent and 16.7 per cent in the rest of Canada.

But Jedwab, who has conducted many demographic polls for the ACS, said he went back to the original Statistics Canada data and concludes the report is "confusing."

He found that 40 per cent of Jewish respondents in Quebec said they had experienced some form of discrimination in the previous five years, compared to 32.7 per cent for the Canadian average. (Forty per cent was the highest of any region. In Ontario, for example, it was 28.7 per cent.)

Jack Jedwab

Of those in Quebec, 51 per cent felt that discrimination was based on their religion, which Jedwab calculates as meaning 20 per cent of the overall Jewish cohort.

"One in five is still high, but it is not as alarming as half would be," he said.

The overall conclusion of the report is that discrimination of any kind is generally lower in Quebec than the rest of Canada, as perceived by respondents.

Just under one-quarter of Quebecers said they have felt some kind of discrimination, while in the rest of Canada, the proportion is almost one-third. The gap is true across most categories: ethno-cultural factors, gender, appearance, sexual orientation, age, and physical or mental disabilities.

However, the most frequent reasons for the perception of discrimination differ markedly. In Quebec, language (68 per cent) and ethno-cultural factors (48.5 per cent) are cited most often, while in the rest of Canada the top two are "ethno-cultural factors" (65.9 per cent) and race (61 per cent).

"Ethno-cultural factors" is a broad category that also includes race, religion and language, as well as origin.

When language is considered alone, just under 40 per cent of those whose language at home is English said they'd experienced discrimination, and among those whose most common language is neither French nor English the number was over one-quarter. These figures were also flagged by the Institut, as were the responses from recent immigrants that were also quite high.

Close to 40 per cent of respondents who had arrived in Canada since 2000 felt they've been victims of discrimination in Quebec, considerably higher than those who had immigrated in earlier decades.

The sample was 27,534 people 15 and over, of whom 5,301 were in Quebec. ■

Heidi Wilk runs marathon in memory of late husband

MARILYN LAZAR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Matthew and Heidi Wilk with their children.

It's been four months since Heidi Wilk lost her husband, Matthew, to brain cancer, and less than one to go until the Chai Lifeline Half Marathon in Miami, which she is running in Matthew's memory Jan. 24.

Wilk is now the sole parent to Brooke, 8, Zachary, 5, and Josh, 3. She works full time and writes a monthly blog (hermagazine.ca). How does she do it? She says Chai Lifeline helps make it possible.

Chai Lifeline provides innovative year-round programs and services aimed at bringing joy back into the lives of seriously ill children and their families, but also to kids whose other family members have serious medical problems.

The people at Chai Lifeline pride themselves on fighting illness with love, designing programs with creativity and delivering them with empathy.

"We're looking to create a movement of people who care deeply about how illness can affect a family, whether it's the parents that are sick, or our core group, children who are seriously or chronically ill," Toronto executive director Mordechai Rothman says. "Our people really think about these things and what they can do to help."

Two Chai Lifeline programs, Camp Simcha and Camp Simcha Special, both overnight camps, are designed to meet the medical and social needs of very sick children and teenagers.

But "it's a challenge for an organization like ours to get the word out because we keep our clients confidential," Rothman says. "Heidi is very outspoken about the support she has received."

Wilk says the organization assesses the needs of a family, then finds a way to help. Initially, when she was juggling three children and becoming the family's sole breadwinner, and subsequently, when she was providing palliative care to her husband at home, the program that fit was Penina's Helping Hand, which helps the young children of a seriously ill parent.

Wilk recalls, for example, the time her son was picked up and driven to a Chai Lifeline "beach day" in King City, where the driver-volunteer got down in the sand to play and got messy painting.

She says it also helped that she could call her caseworker, Rifky Blau, if she hadn't been out of the house with her children on a particular day.

"My role as a Chai Lifeline Canada social worker is to make every family feel like they are my only family," Blau says. "They can call me any time, and I am here for them every minute, every hour and every day, holding their hand and providing compassion and care through it all. Chai Lifeline has perfected this art of giving and providing support in a family-centred way. That means helping people when they need it – not between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

"Our kids and families inspire us to keep giving and we inspire them to move forward during difficult times."

Wilk says palliative care and watching her husband die at home were "traumatizing." Yet, she remains positive, her perspective on what's important forever changed. "People don't know how lucky they are just to have their health and enjoy the smaller things... watching a movie."

Funds raised by the Team Lifeline half-marathon support Chai Lifeline programs. Wilk feels she is giving back to the organization and the community by raising sponsorship dollars. ■

Cost of living affects planning of Jewish services

That's because the high housing prices force many new arrivals into these outlying cities, where accommodation is a little bit more affordable.

While RJDS has space available for more students, the challenge lies in reaching those Jewish families who live in the outlying suburbs.

"We know there are 700 Jewish school-age kids in the tri-cities of Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and Port Moody [east of Vancouver and northeast of Richmond], and as much as the schools may want them, how many families are going to have their kids get on a bus for an hour's commute each way?" Brodt wondered.

"You have to be super-committed to do that when there are good public schools around. If I could create a pipeline to [neighbouring] Burnaby, I'd do it, but the possible customer base there is not ready to make that sort of commitment. They're managing their Jewish lives out there, as is their right."

At the JFGV, Rivkin noted that more than 850 children now live in underserved areas beyond the borders of Vancouver proper, and few are receiving any Jewish education. "With community support, Jewish educators can develop innovative programs via which these kids can access that education, sharing fully the richness of our traditions and strengthening their Jewish identities."

In one such program, the federation collaborated with the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver and funded a pilot project to enable Jewish children living in Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and Port Moody to attend Jewish summer day camp. The project made transportation and fee subsidies available to 22 kids.

The federation has established a regional communities task force that will begin work this month. In the meantime, the organization contributes to a shuttle bus in Richmond that helps seniors attend various community activities, and seniors at the Burquest Jewish Community Centre in Coquitlam can enjoy another day of programming thanks to additional funding provided to the Jewish Family Service Agency.

For young families, the PJ Library is an important outreach program, Rivkin noted. The Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA's PJ Library sends a free, age-appropriate Jewish content book or CD every month to children age six months to seven years who are enrolled in the program.

"For many young families who are raising children in interfaith households and/or who live in the suburbs, PJ Library is a primary Jewish connection. Recently, 100 people attended a PJ Library Chanukah event in Coquitlam," Rivkin said.

Shelley Rivkin

The federation is focused on the future of the Lower Mainland's Jewish community and anticipating programming to reach its needs over the next 15 years.

"Our population of seniors is expected to double by 2030, and an increased number of them will be 85 or older, so programs and services for this group will need to be expanded," Rivkin said.

"As issues of affordability persist, we expect there to be more Jews moving to more affordable suburbs that have little or no Jewish infrastructure. We expect these regional communities to play a larger role, and the Jewish federation will increase its focus on programs and services to reach them."

The cost of living in Vancouver will likely continue to affect those who pay a premium to live near Jewish services and institutions, but find that the cost of Jewish life prevents them from participating.

According to the 2011 National Housing Survey, 16 per cent of the Lower Mainland's Jewish community earned less than the living wage of $36,504. Among Jewish immigrants to the Lower Mainland who arrived between 2005 and 2011, the poverty rate is 25 per cent.

"We expect that increased subsidies for program participation will be needed," Rivkin said, noting that the Tikva Housing Society, a non-profit that helps working-age Jewish low-income adults and families, will expand the affordable housing stock for the Jewish community by 42 additional units in Vancouver and Richmond by 2017.

Vancouver's Jewish community is expanding and changing, and that's a great reason to join it, Shanken said. To those considering a move out west, "Go for it," he urges. "We have a diverse, growing community. The resources are growing and our ability to assist is growing with it. For those interested in coming here, this is really a Jewish community on the rise." ■

Tel Aviv shooting victims mourned at funerals

KEREN PREISKEL
JERUSALEM

Thousands of people turned out last Sunday for the funerals of two people killed in the Jan. 1 shooting attack at a bar in Tel Aviv.

Alon Bakal, 26, the manager of the Simta bar targeted in the shooting, was buried in his hometown of Carmiel, in northern Israel, while Shimon Ruimi, 30, was laid to rest in the southern town of Ofakim.

The two were killed when the suspected gunman, 29-year-old Arab Israeli Nashat Milhem from the village of Arara in northern Israel, opened fire on a bar on Dizengoff Street last Friday afternoon. Seven others were wounded in the attack. Milhem fled the scene and, as The CJN went to press Monday morning, had yet to be apprehended despite a massive manhunt.

Bakal's girlfriend, Lior, mourned that they had been separated so soon after his final message to her which pledged that they would be together forever.

Paying tribute to his son, David Bakal said "your death has left the family crushed, while you are in heaven with your generous soul. Aloni, Aloni, Aloni, we will love you forever."

Bakal recalled his son's drive and his giving nature, saying that as soon as he had achieved one goal, he would immediately move on to his next goal, and that he had collected items for Holocaust survivors but wanted to do even more for them. He also stressed his son's love of people and Israel, and his strong and dedicated personality.

"We had a son, but he is no more," Alon's mother, Nitza, added. "Alon, our beloved child, my prince. I always carry a heavy burden, but I cannot carry this terrible pain forever."

Nitza also called upon the Israeli government to define the attack as a nationalistic attack and that the terrorist should receive the appropriate punishment, stating "that every mother who gives birth to a terrorist should have her home demolished. The terrorist needs to receive a punishment [according to the adage] a tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye and that he shouldn't sit in jail but should get what he deserves. His father shouldn't feel that his conscience is clean because he turned his son in. They should have disarmed him."

Milhem's father, a volunteer policeman, called police Jan. 1 after seeing security camera footage of the attack on television and recognizing his son. Milhem's brother, Jaudat, was arrested that day on suspicion of being an accessory to the crime, according to reports.

> You survived serving in Gaza, you survived war, but you were unable to survive one bullet of hatred that pierced your heart.

In attendance at Bakal's funeral were Likud MK Yaron Mazuz and Yesh Atid leader Yair Lapid, of whose party Bakal was a member. The heads of the nearby Arab regional councils also attended the funeral, among them Sakhnin Mayor Mazen Ganaim.

In Ofakim, some 2,000 mourners attended the funeral for Shimon Ruimi, who had been on a weekend trip to Tel Aviv when he was killed. He was eulogized by his aunt, Mor Peretz.

"Today, we are standing here and instead of celebrating your birthday, we are burying you. It is not the natural way of life for parents to bury their child. Now we understand the term 'before his time.' May God avenge your blood, Shimi," she said.

"You died a martyr's death and have become everyone's child. The fierce rain of the past few days shows how heaven is crying at your passing," she added.

"You survived serving in Gaza, you survived war, but you were unable to survive one bullet of hatred that pierced your heart and at the same time, pierced all of our hearts."

Ofakim Mayor Itzik Danino also paid tribute to Ruimi.

"Our beloved Ruimi family, the hearts of those in Ofakim and in Israel are crying with you at this time, over the murder of your beloved son Shimi, in broad daylight in a noisy street in Tel Aviv."

He also praised Ruimi's parents, Iris and Makluf, for raising a son of whom Israel could be proud, and who had served as a fighter in the Givati Brigade. Ruimi, he said, fell as a fighter on the battlefield of hatred, murdered simply because he was a Jew.

The government was represented by Likud Minister Ofir Akunis, who said that Ruimi had been "murdered by a bloodthirsty terrorist simply because he was a Jew. While we sanctify life, the murderer and his accomplices sanctify death."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visited the site of the Tel Aviv attack on the night of Jan. 2. Standing amid a makeshift memorial to the victims of the attack, including dozens of memorial candles, he sent condolences to the families of the victims of what he called a "heinous and unbelievably vicious murder," and wishes for a quick recovery to the injured. He called on the public to be on "maximum alert."

"I appreciate the condemnations of the crime that have been made by the Arab public," Netanyahu said. "I must say that I expect all Arab MKs, all of them without exception, to clearly condemn the murder without hesitation. Murder is murder, and must be condemned and acted against from whatever quarter."

The prime minister also acknowledged what he called "wild radical Islamic incitement against the State of Israel in the Arab sector."

"There is incitement in mosques, in the educational system and in social media," he said. "I am not prepared to accept two states of Israel – a state of law for most of its citizens and a state within a state for some of them, in enclaves in which there is no law enforcement and in which there is Islamist incitement, rampant crime and illegal weapons that are frequently fired at events such as weddings. This era has ended."

Milhem, the fugitive, received a five-year jail sentence in 2007 for attacking an Israeli soldier and attempting to seize his gun.

In 2007, Milhem said he attacked the soldier to avenge the death of his cousin, who was killed in 2006 in a police raid. Milhem also was arrested prior to his jailing for selling drugs. According to the family attorney, he suffers from mental disorders.

Schools in Tel Aviv opened as scheduled on Sunday, but only about half the students showed up. Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai said children whose parents did not send them to school would not be penalized.

Leaders of the Arab-Israeli community in Wadi Ara condemned the attack. ■

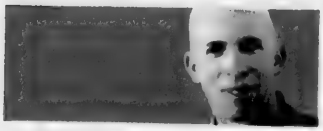
OPINION

The speech that could change Israeli Arabs' reality



Sagi Melamed

My brothers and sisters, fellow Arab citizens of Israel:

We will soon mark 68 years since the State of Israel was established, an event our parents called the nakba, the catastrophe. We must do some soul-searching. I call upon you to join me and take a realistic and responsible look at our future here in Israel. I realize that many will attack me – politically, personally, perhaps even physically. I am not afraid. This is why I was elected.

I call upon you to embrace the following principles:

• Although we would have preferred otherwise, we recognize that Israel was established in 1948 as a home for the Jewish People – the only Jewish state in the world. And so, after almost a century of conflict, we renounce our aspirations to Arab rule over any part of Israel – aspirations that have mostly harmed us. Look around: is there any Arab country where you would prefer to live instead of this Jewish state?

• We know the road from armed confrontation and territorial conflict to peace, full equality and living in harmony, is long and rocky. War can start overnight, but a true and lasting peace is built over time. We choose to follow this path and take responsibility for the success of the process of building peace.

• We, Arab citizens of the Jewish state, expect full rights and equal opportunities. At the same time, we realize that as a minority in conflict with the ruling majority, we enjoy many rights and opportunities, more than we could expect anywhere in the Arab world. Some examples: a Supreme Court judge, affirmative action in universities and public service, and targeted economic development programs. Furthermore, Arab women in Israel enjoy more opportunities, representation and equal rights than practically anywhere in the Arab world. Yet, we Israeli Arabs still have a long road toward full equality.

• We look to the Jewish immigrants of the United States and Canada as our role models for successful integration of a minority. A century ago, they were excluded, persecuted, downtrodden. Today, a glance at the names of Nobel prizewinners, the world's wealthiest people, heads of major organizations, among others, shows us that an ambitious minority can thrive if they are willing to work hard and take responsibility. Let us learn from them and thrive ourselves! We are proud when we see more and more motivated, talented Arab engineers, doctors, entrepreneurs breaking glass ceilings. They show leadership and responsibility instead of complaining and waiting for others to lead. Let's put an end to being oppressed – from today we shall act and we shall be successful!

• We understand that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is not over. We are torn by this bitter dispute, and there are times when it defines our identity. However, we recognize that we must choose. If we want to be citizens of Israel, we cannot act against it – nowhere in the world would that be tolerated. If we cannot accept that, we know we have a choice – we can emigrate elsewhere.

This (sadly) imaginary speech by the head of the Joint Arab List (political party with large representation in today's Knesset), and its adoption by Arab Israelis, could have a great impact on many levels:

One, on the responsibility and attitude of Arab Israelis for themselves and their future.

Two, on relations between Israel's Jewish citizens and their Arab compatriots.

Three, globally. Countries, organizations and people would rush to support this historic declaration to promote the integration of the Arab minority in Israel.

Four, among moderate Arab states. Many will be surprised, but much support can be expected from this quarter.

And finally, among radical elements in the Arab world. They will make every effort to torpedo the initiative and eliminate the initiator.

Will there be an Arab leader with the vision and courage to present such an initiative? If one is found, would that leader survive – politically and physically? ■

Police reveal details behind deadly July attack

JUDAH ARI GROSS
JERUSALEM

In the late hours of July 30, Amiram Ben-Uliel set out for the West Bank village of Duma, armed with a bag full of ingredients for Molotov cocktails, spray-paint cans and other supplies, in order to carry out a pre-dawn attack against Palestinians in revenge for the killing of Israeli Malachy Rosenfeld the month before, the Shin Bet security service revealed on Jan.3.

Ben-Uliel, 21, admitted his crime to Shin Bet investigators and re-enacted parts of it on Dec. 19, the agency said. That information, however, was kept from the public under a gag order until last Sunday when the indictments were filed.

Rosenfeld, 25, was fatally shot June 29 on his way home from a basketball game. Three other Israelis were hurt in that attack in the Kochav Hashachar settlement.

Ben-Uliel was a member of an organization called Givonim, a subset of the Hilltop Youth, a group of extremist Jewish activists. The Givonim seek to accomplish their goal of anointing a king over Israel by carrying out a violent coup against the government, and murdering or expelling all non-Jews from Israel, the Shin Bet said in a statement following the indictment of Ben-Uliel and his accomplice on Sunday.

Ali Saad Dawabsha, an 18-month-old, died in the July 31 attack. His parents, Saad and Riham Dawabsha, were evacuated with severe burns to Tel Hashomer Hospital where they eventually succumbed. His four-year-old brother Ahmed Dawabsha, who is still mostly confined to a wheelchair, was recently moved to a rehabilitation ward. The left side of Ahmed's face was unharmed, but the right bears bright red burn scars from the firebombing. He was only able to take his first steps on Dec. 22, nearly five months after the attack.

Ben-Uliel was supposed to meet another activist, a minor whose name has been withheld, at a cave near the village of Duma, located south of the city of Nablus and close to the Jewish settlements of Alon Moreh and Shilo.

Right-wing Jewish activists protest in late December outside a court hearing in Petach Tikvah, where one of the youths was arrested for his involvement in an arson attack in Duma, earlier this summer. TOMER NEUBERG FLASH 90 PHOTO

The minor – referred to only by his Hebrew initials, Aleph Aleph – had assisted Ben-Uliel in collecting information about the layout of the village and had helped plan the firebombing attack, the indictment said. On the night, however, the minor did not make it to their meeting place in time, the Shin Bet said.

So at around midnight, Ben-Uliel went to Duma to carry out the attack by himself, the security service said, contradicting Palestinian claims made earlier in the investigation that two people were seen fleeing the village soon after the attack. Investigators did not provide an explanation for the discrepancy between the indictment and the eyewitness accounts.

According to the Shin Bet account, Ben-Uliel arrived at the Palestinian village on foot and began searching for a house deep within it. He located two homes and allegedly sat down in the yard of one in order to prepare the firebombs he had brought to be used in the attack.

Once his weapons were prepared, Ben-Uliel spray-painted the words "Revenge" and "The Messiah-King will live" on the walls of the house, the Israel Police said.

"In one of the houses, the Dawabsha family was present at the time of the attack. The second house was empty of people," police said once a long-standing gag order on the case was lifted.

Ben-Uliel then allegedly lobbed his firebombs into the two houses and fled the scene on foot, bound for his home in Jerusalem.

"As a result of the firebombing, a one-and-a-half-year-old was burned to death, and his mother and father were mortally wounded and later died of their injuries. Another child, a four-and-a-half-year-old, was severely injured and is today in rehabilitation," the police said.

Israel Police, the Shin Bet security service and the Central District Attorney's office opened an investigation into the incident on July 31.

Over the course of the 156-day investigation, hundreds of people were questioned. In the end, Israel filed 36 indictments against Jewish extremists for various levels of connection with the attack, from Ben-Uliel and Aleph Aleph, who were directly involved, to those who were only peripherally connected with the deadly firebombing.

In addition to the Duma terror attack, the suspects were indicted for a variety of other "price tag" hate crime attacks – acts of violence and vandalism against Palestinians in the West Bank and Israel.

Yinon Reuveni, Hanoch Ganiram and three other minors – known by their Hebrew initials Tzadi Bet, Mem Shin and Yud Kuf, respectively – were indicted for an arson attack against Jerusalem's Dormition Abbey, the burning of a Palestinian taxi in the West Bank village of Yasuf, setting fire to a grain silo in the West Bank village of Akraba, two instances of tire-slashing in the Jerusalem Arab neighbourhood of Beit Safafa, an assault on a Palestinian shepherd near the West Bank settlement of Kochav Hashachar and other acts of violence against Palestinians.

An additional 23 young Jewish terrorists have been investigated for their roles in some 20 other attacks against Palestinians in the West Bank and Israel. The men have not yet been charged for their alleged crimes, but may be indicted in the future, the Shin Bet said. ■

Anne Frank's diary enters public domain after copyright expires

JTA
AMSTERDAM

Two editions of the Diary of Anne Frank were published online in a challenge to the foundation that allocates the book's royalties.

A French lawmaker and a French scholar published the diary on Jan. 1, when the current copyright expired.

European copyrights generally expire 70 years after an author's death, thus the copyright was expected to expire at the end of 2015. However, Anne Frank Fonds, the Swiss foundation that Frank's father, Otto, established to allocate the book's royalties to charity, announced recently that it planned to list Otto Frank as a co-author, thus adding 35 years to the copyright. Otto Frank, the sole survivor of the eight Jews who sought refuge in the attic, died in 1980.

Early last week, however, an Amsterdam court ruled that the original text of the diary may be copied for academic research.

Isabelle Attard, a French Parliament member whose grandparents died in the Holocaust, published the entire Dutch text of the diary on Friday, the French news agency AFP reported. Separately, Olivier Ertzscheid, a lecturer at the University of Nantes, published the text on his website the same day.

"The intimate diary, written in a secret apartment in Amsterdam by a Jewish teenager, born German but stripped of her nationality, has finally entered the public domain," Attard said in a statement on her website. "Seventy years after the author's death, the whole world can use, translate and interpret these works, and use them to create new ones."

Frank's diary, which chronicles two years of hiding from the Nazis in an Amsterdam attic, may be the most famous Holocaust-era document and has inspired several play and film adaptations. Anne died in 1945 at the Bergen-Belsen extermination camp.

Adolf Hitler's anti-Semitic diatribe Mein Kampf also entered the public domain on Jan. 1. ■

Sendak exhibit includes 'wild things'

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Toronto Reference Library is hosting a travelling exhibition of original artwork by Maurice Sendak, the author and illustrator of the 1963 children's classic, Where the Wild Things Are.

Aimed at three- to five-year-olds, the book portrayed the darker side of childhood, including temper tantrums and bad behaviour, at a time when picture books offered safe, sanitized and happy-go-lucky versions of childhood. Sendak is "beloved for capturing the more complex feelings of childhood," said Nicole Dawkins, gallery and exhibit curator at the Toronto Public Library.

Developed in 2012 by the AFA NYC gallery, the multimedia exhibit features illustrations from Where the Wild Things Are and other works by Sendak, as well as set and costume designs for operas and theatrical productions, animation cels, posters and sketches of wild things that Sendak gave to his fans and friends.

In Where the Wild Things Are, Sendak's young hero, Max, is sent to bed without supper after misbehaving. That night, a forest grows in his room and an ocean rushes by with a boat to take him to the place where the wild things are. There he faces his fear and anxieties, depicted as horned monsters with clawed feet and yellow eyes, and confronts them.

The book won the prestigious Caldecott Medal for most distinguished picture book in 1964, while at the same time, it was banned in libraries across the United States for its dark undertones and lack of moralizing. The renowned psychiatrist Bruno Bettelheim was critical, too, but from a different angle. He maintained that the story of a boy who's sent to his room without supper for misbehaving would traumatize the book's audience. Far from becoming traumatized though, children loved and related to the simple 338-word story of how Max tames the beasts by staring into their eyes without blinking.

Where the Wild Things Are was an expression of Sendak's lonely and difficult childhood. According to the website Mental Floss, his mother, Sarah, was emotionally unbalanced, and Sendak has described himself as a sickly child who escaped by drawing in his room.

His parents were Jewish immigrants from Poland. At Sendak's bar mitzvah in 1941, his father, Philip, got the news that the Nazis had destroyed his shtetl and murdered the village's Jews or sent them to concentration camps. So the Holocaust was a cloud that hung over Sendak's family home in Brooklyn, N.Y., during his teen years.

The inspiration for the term "wild things" came from Sendak's mother. As a child, when he drove his mother nuts, she would call him a "vilde chaye," meaning "wild animal" in Yiddish.

When developing the monsters for the book, Sendak, who died in 2012, drew on his childhood memories of his immigrant relatives. "That's what art is. I mean, you don't make up stories, you live your life," Sendak has said.

According to Mental Floss, his uncles and aunts would come on Sundays and "all say the same dumb things," he once recalled. "How big you are, how fat you got, and you look so good we could eat you up. So the only entertainment was watching their bloodshot eyes and how bad their teeth were. You know, children are monstrously cruel about physical defects – the hair curling out of the nose, the weird mole on the side of the head. And so, you would glue in on that and then you talk about it with your brother and sister later. And they became the wild things."

At the Toronto Reference Library's Sendak exhibit, kids can board a re-creation of Max's boat and use a digital touch screen to choose different backgrounds for wild things and create their own scenes. Sendak Preschool Time from 10 to 10:30 a.m. on Jan. 12, 19 and 26 in the library's TD Gallery features stories, songs and rhymes inspired by Sendak's work for children ages three to five, with their parents or caregivers.

The exhibit at the Toronto Reference Library continues until Jan. 31. A related exhibit at the Lillian H. Smith branch of the Toronto Public Library that showcases more of Sendak's work and the work of artists and innovators who inspired him runs until March 5. Israeli Omri Casspi enjoys career year with NBA's Kings

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Omri Casspi's trip through Toronto last month largely passed under the radar. UJA Federation didn't hold a post-Chanukah event for the Israeli basketball player. And the Raptors, playing Casspi's Sacramento Kings, didn't schedule a Jewish heritage night. The excitement of Casspi's first years on North American soil has subsided.

"I enjoyed it at the time," Casspi said about an hour before a Dec. 20 game the Kings won 104-94. "I enjoy every once in a while when they have Jewish heritage nights. Seeing the fans is always great. I don't think it was a distraction. Maybe when you're younger it takes some focus, but as you grow older and are a little more experienced, you can just focus on the game of basketball."

To call Casspi's first season in the National Basketball Association his 15 minutes of fame would be untrue. He developed his game in the Israeli league, where he became a go-to scorer. When the Kings drafted him in 2009, it marked the first time an Israeli was selected in the first round. He then became the first Israeli to play in the NBA.

Still, the small forward struggled after leaving the Kings at the end of the 2010-11 season – first with the Cleveland Cavaliers and less so with the Houston Rockets. He returned to Sacramento last year, playing well before signing a two-year contract in the off-season.

Now, despite being the only Israeli – or, for that matter, Jewish – player in the NBA, he has received more headlines for his game than for his ethnicity or nationality. At 27, he is recording career highs across the board. His 12-plus points per game eclipse the 10.3 mark of his rookie year.

But it's his shooting percentage that has drawn the most raves: 51 per cent from the field, including 46 per cent from three-point range. On Dec. 28, Casspi scored a career-high 36 points, though it wasn't enough to secure a win against all-star and 2015 MVP Stephen Curry and the reigning NBA champions Golden State Warriors in Oakland.

And while the bulk of Casspi's minutes have come off the bench, the small forward has started 13 games as Willey Cauley-Stein recovers from injury.

"It's a little bit of everything, I think," he said when asked to explain his improvement this year. "Experience comes into play – I'm learning my game, learning the NBA. I have a few years under my belt, with different coaches. I'm finally playing for the system that I wanted to play my whole career, with the right spacing and the right passing and making plays. It makes me feel better on the basketball court."

In basketball parlance, Casspi is a "glue guy," a player whose value to the team can't completely be described in numbers. Think former Raptor Amir Johnson or, on this year's team, DeMarre Carroll, a high-character, shut-down defender. Casspi frustrates opponents and number crunchers with other miscellany: speed, passing, feel for the game's rhythms, recognition of teammates' tendencies and how to adjust to them.

Last summer, Casspi escorted an Israel trip for a group of players from around the league, including teammates Demarcus Cousins and Caron Butler. Organized by Casspi's foundation, the week-long trip squeezed sightseeing and NBA Cares events into an itinerary covering Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and the Dead Sea.

"I just wanted to do something to show my colleagues, celebrities around the world, to have good publicity for my country," he said. "Goodwill ambassadors are something you always need, especially people who have such a big following. For them to see a different market was awesome."

The trip received media coverage in the general press, but also drew fire for its perceived politics. Some pointed to the private jet provided by pro-Israel casino mogul Sheldon Adelson. Casspi, who still plays for the national team and has tweeted in support of Israel, remains nonplussed.

"I knew in advance [about the criticism]," he said. "It didn't really affect me. I felt like there was nothing political with it. Demarcus invited me to his house; I invited him to mine. It shouldn't be any different, even though we're in a conflict region. I'm planning on doing the same thing next year with different players – maybe some the same."

Between trips home, his family visits North America regularly, most recently over Chanukah. While he hopes to see other Israeli players join the NBA soon – compatriot Gal Mekel was waived by the Dallas Mavericks in 2014 after a season – he refused to name the most likely candidate.

"You never know. It's just a matter of guys who want to work hard, put in the work, getting better every year. You know, this league is good." ■

Adventures in Jewish Pl-Euro-lism

Chaimie and Leizer

Greetings from Birmingham, U.K., coal mining epicentre and birthplace of Black Sabbath and Ozzy Osborne (or, as we like to call them, Shvartzn Shabbes and Izzy Bornstein). We write you on the latest stop of YidLife Crisis' first European Tour (what internally we are calling "National Lampoon's European Excommunication").

We started in Krakow, Poland, where we performed in the 16th-century-built High Synagogue, and found a fascinating combination of old survivors and many young non-Jews interested – in both academic and very practical, living ways – in the country's re-emerging Jewish roots. We also learned that Krakow was named for its medieval King Krak (references to Rob Ford were lost on our tour guide).

Next was a Yiddish Anarchist tour of London's historic East End. Many Jewish Russian and Polish immigrants arrived there at the turn of the century to live in sweatshop poverty, only for the neighbourhood to become gentrified as "the" hip new area. (It's NYC's Lower East Side meets Kensington Market, sprinkled with equal parts curry and Monty Python.)

While we learned a lot on that tour and thought we had Britain's Jews pegged, our gestalt would get geshtupt in Birmingham, site of Limmud UK, the largest Jewish conference of its kind. For 35 years, around Christmas, British Jews of all sects, orientations, dialects and relative resemblances to Benny Hill assemble for what can best be described as a veritable fringe festival of Jewish learning: academic conference meets music festival meets Jewish summer camp – in winter. (FYI, British Jews don't eat Chinese or go to movies on Christmas. They also call bagels "beigels" – Euston, we have a problem).

Limmud UK is the crown jewel in a global network of Limmuds – which includes events in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Calgary and Ottawa – and attracts an incredibly diverse assembly of Jews and non-Jews among the more than 2,000 attendees, from the frum to the foul (that's us, obviously). Impressively, it's all buoyed up by the tireless work of 70 year-round volunteers, running entirely on youthful optimism and caffeine (realistically, the only two things that can save the world). There were 1,100 presentations given, not including seminars on where bathrooms are located.

Some of the more salient presentations that caught our attention, from the most intellectual to the most sensual:

Why the future is haredi… and why it might not be: Jonathan Boyd of the Institute for Jewish Policy Research has European Jewish demographics down to a science and as good a view as any about how the future of British Jewry might play out. Haredi or not, here they come?

JDOV Talks: These recorded online talks are like TED talks done by and for Jews (not to be confused with YID Talks, Yiddish ramblings that we shout at each other after our third pint of Guinness). To our dismay, we were privileged enough to be asked to give one of these talks – we'll post it next month for your viewing "pleasure."

Anglo-Yiddish popular culture –Cockney-Yiddish music hall: Be honest, you can't not be interested in "Cockney Yiddish."

Is Porky Pig Jewish? It's the question we've always wanted answered but were afraid to ask. Until now.

Rebbetzin's disco: A Limmud favourite, it's an inebriated dance party DJed by a rebbetzin and her associates. BYOB (Bring Your Own Booze/Bencher).

Zusha: We're biased because they appear in our videos, but a packed hall can't lie. This chassidic trio is like Matisyahu if he multiplied by three, harmonized with himself, and put his tzitzit back on.

Gefilte fish! New York's Gefilteria are experts of, amongst other things, the Gefilteration process. Can you say Carp-e Diem?

B'emess, hats off to the British Jews (the Brews?) for the lively learning and enrichment. And such huge portions! God bless their inquisitive minds. And God save the Queen (Elizabeth II or Barbra Streisand – your call). ■

Chaimie and Leizer are Jamie Elman and Eli Batalion, co-creators of the world's first online Yiddish sitcom YidLife Crisis.

A land far away: Jewish Mitteleuropa

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Every end-of-year media round-up highlighted the plight of refugees as the story of 2015. Photographs held sway in capturing the depth and breadth of the disaster, and one could argue that the immediacy of events is better served by documentary photographers than the background causes for the outflow of millions from Syria on their way to Europe.

The idea that photographs offer something beyond language took hold in the aftermath of World War II, when, initially, print journalists led the way, until photographs proved brutally direct in their ability to take account of what the German war in Europe caused in total human suffering.

But the power of the photograph to examine social facts was recognized in the 1920s. In response to the work of German photographer August Sander, one writer concluded that entire "stories could be told" from Sander's photographs of ordinary Germans: "They are raw material for writers, material that is more stimulating and more productive than many a newspaper report…"

In the years that Sander was photographing German farmers, workers, and what he called "The Persecuted" of the Nazi regime, Joseph Roth was riding the rails across Europe, from Marseilles to Astrakhan, sampling the hotels of Tirana (in Albania), Rome and Hamburg, even off into the sticks in Polish Galicia. He was among the best-known European newspaper writers of his era, sending dispatches to newspapers in Berlin, Frankfurt and Prague, while working on novels and short stories.

The Hotel Years collects newly translated articles that date from the immediate post-World War I moment up to the outbreak of World War II. In this way, they depict the variety of disasters that transformed European life and sent millions in any direction that would take them away from their home's particular calamity.

Of Sarajevo Roth writes: "The World War began in Sarajevo, on a balmy summer afternoon in 1914. It was a Sunday; I was a student at the time. In the afternoon a girl came round. Girls wore plaits in those days. She was carrying a large yellow straw hat in her hand, it was like summer coming to call…"

The Hotel Years
by Joseph Roth

New Directions

> Once the 1920s are in full swing, Roth's material is ripe and varied.

The Russian Revolution sends its émigrés fleeing and Roth runs into them in Paris: "The émigrés saw themselves as the only rightful representatives of Russia. What grew to significance in Russia following the Revolution was decried as 'un-Russian' or 'Jewish' or 'cosmopolitan.'"

Once the 1920s are in full swing, Roth's material is ripe and varied. Emigrants crowd into ships heading for the unknown. On a ship called the USS Pittsburgh, leaving Bremerhaven, he spies "people from the east, mainly Jews, lucky to have escaped the Europe of pogroms; also Russian peasants and young Ukrainian women, with colourful headscarves like summer meadows…"

In Germany, political and economic crises throw up a vicious struggle between Marxists and German nationalist parties that include the Nazis. Strolling in wintertime Berlin in 1923, Roth encounters two "high-school kids" walking "arm in arm, like a pair of drunks, and singing: Down, down, down with the Jewish republic, Filthy Yids, Filthy Yids!"

Lurking in the background of all this, and especially difficult for Roth to accept, is the end of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and the relatively safe home it presented to Jews under the rule of Emperor Franz Josef. "There was once an emperor," he writes nostalgically. "A great part of my childhood and youth happened under the often merciless lustre of His Majesty, which I am entitled to write about today because I was so vehemently opposed to it then." It is the "shock" of the emperor's death years before that Roth recalls for his readers in the Frankfurter Zeitung in 1928. "The chilly sun of the Hapsburgs was being extinguished, but it had at least been a sun."

The writer of such sharp-eyed commentary spent the '20s on the road, in hotels, wandering strange city streets and countrysides. Hotels became his haven. A section of The Hotel Years traces his travels, with attention to lobbies, cafés, window views, and the people met along the way. In one hotel, Roth takes account of "commercial travellers… the traveller in soaps… The paper seller… The man with the fountain pens…" He recalls receptionists, cooks, waiters and figures who appear now in movies as running gags: "the night porter comes along, and lights the evening. Fresh, youthful, shaved and powdered, in blue and gold livery, he rises like a second morning when the world has evening." The night porter and his comrades oversee Roth's magic land of "exotic" visitors who waft "through the glass wings of the revolving doors into the lobby."

Roth's life and work deteriorated in the 1930s as his alcoholism worsened. In 1936, he wrote to his friend and supporter Stefan Zweig, another chronicler of Jewish Mitteleuropa: "Journalism. Revolting work. Humiliation. Sixteen books. Success. And in the last five years, associated with personal unhappiness and therefore invalidated." Zweig struggled to save Roth from financial and personal collapse, but he was dead in 1939, at age 44.

It is as if Roth's writerly life was too tightly linked to the events he covered in his dispatches to newspapers in European capitals. As Europe headed toward its greatest disaster, the continent's eminent chronicler ran out of options. ■

A chicken in every pot

BEVERLY LEVITT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Chicken is like Scheherazade's tales – there are 1,001 ways to prepare it! Whether it be baked, barbecued, braised, boiled, broiled, fricasseed, fried, grilled, poached, sautéed, steamed, stewed, stir fried or stuffed, its mild flavour makes it the perfect foil for a wide variety of herbs, spices, fruits, vegetables, and sauces.

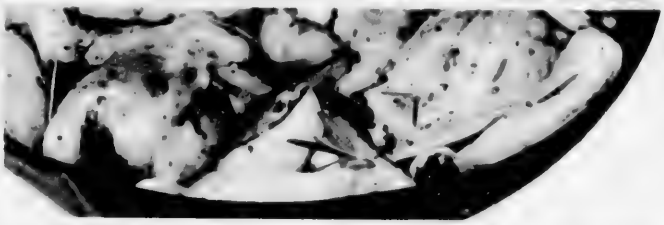
People are eating more chicken than ever before. Many health conscious folks are rejecting red meat in their fervent quest for lower fat diets. It's actually become a status symbol to announce, "Sorry, I only eat fowl and fish." Of course the extremists brag, "Sorry, I only eat white meat."

While chicken's skinless white meat is 33 to 80 per cent leaner than trimmed, cooked beef, its dark meat with the skin intact derives 56 per cent of its calories from fat. If low fat is what you're after, it's the white meat chicken breast that should grace your plate. It is also the most versatile to prepare.

San Francisco chicken stir fry

- ❑ 3 whole skinless chicken breasts, cut into 1 in. chunks
- ❑ 2 tbsp. peanut oil
- ❑ 2 cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 2 small red peppers, cored, deribbed and cut into 1/2 in. chunks
- ❑ 1 yellow onion, cut into eighths
- ❑ 1 cup toasted, unsalted cashews
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chili paste
- ❑ 2 tbsp. soy sauce (can use low sodium)
- ❑ 1/2 cup vegetable broth (fresh, canned or cubed)
- ❑ 1 tbsp. corn starch mixed with 1 tbsp. warm water (optional)
- ❑ 1 bunch green onions, halved lengthwise and sliced diagonally into 1-in. pieces.

Heat oil to very hot in heavy frying pan or wok. Add chicken pieces; stir fry 2 minutes. Using slotted spoon, remove to plate. Place garlic, red peppers, onions and cashews in pan; stir fry for 1 minute. Add chicken back to pan, stir in chili paste, soy sauce, broth, corn starch. Add green onions, stir fry 30 seconds longer. Serve over white rice. Serves 6.



Texas barbecue chicken

Barbecue sauce depends largely on the whim and creativity of the maker. This recipe comes from a cowboy cook who has "barbecued enough to know." If it is too spicy, hold the pepper. The chicken may also be roasted or broiled. The recipe makes about 2 cups so you may have sauce leftover.

- ❑ 1 - 3 1/2 to 4 pound chicken, trussed and ready for a spit

Barbecue sauce

- ❑ olive oil for sautéing
- ❑ 1 large onion, grated
- ❑ 2 garlic cloves, minced
- ❑ 1/4 cup olive oil
- ❑ 1 cup vinegar
- ❑ 1/2 cup ketchup
- ❑ 1 cup water
- ❑ 2 tbsp. Worcestershire sauce
- ❑ juice of 1 lemon
- ❑ 1 tbsp. dry mustard
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chili powder
- ❑ 1 tsp. cayenne
- ❑ 1 tsp. black pepper
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 cup brown sugar
- ❑ 2 bay leaves, crushed

Pour oil into a frying pan. When oil is hot, sauté onion and garlic until golden. Combine oil, vinegar, 1 cup water, ketchup, Worcestershire sauce, lemon juice, spices, sugar and bay leaves. Add to mixture. Simmer 15 to 20 minutes or until flavours are thoroughly blended. Brush on chicken skin, place on barbecue spit. Continue basting chicken at intervals until chicken is finished, about 1 hour or until drumstick is pliable when moved. Serves 4 to 6.

Transparent's hateful characters are hard not to love

Sarah and Tammy's wedding is the focus of the first episode of season 2.

There's one line in the pilot episode of season 1 of Amazon's Transparent that perfectly sets the stage for the show's unfolding drama.

Protagonist Maura Pfefferman, played by Jeffrey Tambor, at 68 is beginning the process of coming out as a woman to her three adult children and ex-wife, all of whom know her as Mort, their father and former husband. She is sharing her feelings at a support group.

Coming to terms with the profound self-centredness of her progeny, Maura wonders aloud, "How did I raise three such selfish kids?"

The question highlights the irony that's at the heart of Transparent: all the members of the Pfefferman clan, on whom the show focuses, are distinctly tone-deaf to the ways in which their actions affect others, each believing completely in the primacy of his or her suffering.

The first season, which streamed in 2014, starts to explore the complex dynamics of this highly damaged family and sees Pfefferman siblings Sarah (played by Amy Landecker), Josh (Jay Duplass) and Ali (Gaby Hoffmann), as well as their mother Shelly (Judith Light), coming to terms with Maura's transition to a woman. But season 2, which began streaming Dec. 12 on Shomi, delves more deeply into the ways the characters inflict emotional wounds on one other and those around them, all the while enamoured of their own individual perceived sense of victimhood.

It may sound horrible, but show creator Jill Soloway, whose inspiration for the concept came from her own father's coming out as transgender later in life, does a brilliant job of tempering her characters' hatefulness with just the right notes of humour and poignancy, making Transparent both utterly entertaining and deeply satisfying to watch – and this is to say nothing of the show's interesting exploration of gender politics.

Season 2, in particular, is hilarious and horrifying from the very start, showing in near equal measure the outrageous lengths the Pfeffermans will go to serve their own interests as well as the depth of pain each experiences.

The first episode features the wedding day of the eldest sister, Sarah, who has recently left the father of her children for her lover, Tammy, with whom she betrayed him.

Jeffrey Tambor as Maura Pfefferman

> Season 2 is hilarious and horrifying from the very start

With all of them dressed in pristine white (again, Soloway prods at the irony of the Pfeffermans' blind attempts to absolve themselves of their many transgressions), the family poses for a photography session that is cut short when the photographer refers to Maura as "sir."

The physical beauty of the lavish outdoor wedding, set in the hills of Los Angeles, is offset by the fact, made increasingly clear to the viewer, that Sarah has realized she's made a terrible decision.

The episode comes to a hilarious head when Sarah ditches the horah and is found hiding in a bathroom stall weeping to sister Ali that not only does she not want to be married to Tammy, but that she "hates" her.

When Ali summons their brother Josh and his Reform rabbi girlfriend Raquel (played by Kathryn Hahn) to help deal with the crisis, Raquel, who officiated at the wedding, informs Sarah that she hasn't yet sent the requisite papers to the city and Sarah and Tammy aren't actually married.

"Well, what's a wedding then?" Ali sputters, to which Raquel responds wearily, "A very expensive play."

Giddy with relief, the sisters explode in laughter, while Raquel – frequently a casualty of the Pfeffermans' insensitivity – looks pained.

The joke is further played out in a later episode, when the siblings attend a party at Maura's house and are excited to find the leftover wedding cake in the fridge – they promptly add it to the buffet table.

While watching Transparent is a bit like watching a train wreck, its perfectly timed dark humour and emotional depth make it hard not to love. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

Reflections on the final journey

Lauren Kramer

It was the golf balls that did it.

I was interviewing a man who sold coffins for a living when he delivered the news that the bases of the simple wood coffins used to inter the Jewish dead are perforated with holes the size of golf balls. The purpose of the holes, I'm guessing, is to accelerate the 'dust to dust' procedure by allowing liquids to drain quickly and easily from the body. Given that 55-to-60 per cent of the human body is water, that's a fair quantity of liquid. But it doesn't make for a pretty visual, does it?

Like most of us, I've long been fearful of death. As a child I'd scare myself witless late at night about that final journey, lying in bed and trying over and over to imagine where I'd be going. As years have passed I like to think I've grown into a more comfortable acceptance of the inevitability of death. I comfort myself that if there is a final journey, there's a good chance I'll run into less-newly-deceased people I very much want to see again. That's the silver lining I'm hoping for.

But if there isn't, I worry: will I have any awareness of the pitch blackness of that simple casket? Will I feel the thud of soil on wood as my friends and family say goodbye? Will I feel those fluids drain out of the golf-ball-sized holes in the bottom of my casket, and will I know it as a series of bugs invades my limbs and gnaws on my tissues? That's the part that torments me. Maybe the dead have an element of consciousness we living just don't know about. Maybe the pitch black and the bugs are the final journey to dust.

In a CBC radio documentary, I learned recently that forensic entomologists can tell exactly how long a body has been decomposing by which bug species inhabit it. It starts with flies – they begin the process of consuming the body and laying larvae inside it. After the blow-flies, flesh flies and black soldier flies are done, beetles come in and feed on the body and the fly larvae, and do the last cleanup.

Since I'm not a bug-friendly person – I'm the one squishing them with a large book – I don't relish the thought of being bug food. When I consider the possibilities, cremation sounds a whole lot more appealing – a whoosh of flames, an instant evaporation and a few minutes later, a new me: compacted ashes in a small jar. No lengthy decomposition, no pitch blackness. Just a gentle scattering of what's left of me so the breeze can drift it away. Cremation seems a whole lot cleaner, really, and I like clean. But being Jewish, of course, it's not an option.

In western society today we're superb when it comes to pushing death to the sidelines. It's considered morbid to discuss one's fears until just before the end arrives, at which point there's really little time left to go into much detail. Maybe that's why death hits us so hard when it takes people we love, whether it's suddenly or gradually. It's so final, so unknown and so taboo that we never get comfortable with what it represents. We attend a funeral, help fill a grave and then turn our thoughts to those suffering the deepest bereavement as the role of comforters. We don't like to think about the final journey and what happens next to the newly departed.

But of course, it's coming, for each one of us. We're just passing through, and time will fly by, and sooner or later we will all be forgotten because those left alive won't know or remember us. All that's left will be faded tombstones in large cemeteries that will likely someday be carved up for residential or commercial development, because so much land just for bones will seem like a waste of space when it could be better used for the living.

That's the way it goes. So I remind myself, each day is a gift. Treasure the moment. Live each day to the fullest. When I start to worry about death and golf-ball holes, I recite epigrams like these and remind myself to celebrate life in the time I have left. After all, we have no control over what's to come. ■

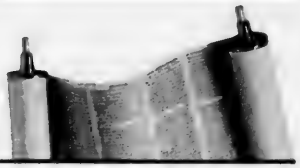
Va'era | Exodus 6:2-9:35



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier explains why the process of change is neither quick nor easy
Rabbi Denise Handlarski reflects on some contemporary lessons of the Exodus narrative
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen says when Jews cry out from the bottom of their hearts, God listens

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

For a brief while, Moses and Aaron enjoy a "honeymoon period" as the leaders of a downtrodden people. They deliver exciting promises, and the people respond with enthusiasm. After Moses and Aaron gather the people – and Aaron performs the requisite signs – the people "believed… bowed their heads and worshipped." (Exodus 4:31) A short while later, however, cynicism and disbelief set in. After Moses reiterates the promise of redemption, the people "hearken not unto Moses for impatience of spirit…" (Exodus 6:9)

What happens in this short period that changes the attitude of Israel from a population eager for redemption to a people unable to embrace the message of hope?

According to the Talmud Yerushalmi (cited in Torah Temimah 6:6), the shift in attitude was due to the realization that the process would be neither quick nor easy. Whereas the first promise was conveyed through divine signs – indicating miraculous and immediate deliverance – the repetition of the promise omitted these signs. The people then understood that change would only come after a long, difficult process.

The prospect of improving our lives is something we all embrace. What is more challenging, however, is to sustain our efforts to change and grow over a long period of time. As I write these words, we prepare to celebrate the secular New Year, and we contemplate our resolutions for the coming year. Frustratingly, experience teaches that resolutions are difficult to uphold: one study found that while 45 per cent of Americans make such resolutions, only eight per cent are successful in achieving their goals.

The Israelites experienced a similar decline in their resolve. The sustained effort required to achieve redemption was difficult for them to rally behind. The change they did achieve, then, emerges from the leadership of Moses and Aaron – the indefatigable championing of vision and values that ultimately led an impatient people to embrace, and ultimately experience, their long-awaited freedom. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

This parshah contains the repeated plea by Moses to Pharaoh to "Let my people go." To me, this is the pivotal moment of the entire Exodus narrative. We need to ask for our freedom, and we need to ask many times. The focus of the parshah is the plagues, the magic that Moses and Aaron perform in order to convince the Pharaoh. But in my view, the real magic is having the tenacity to ask and ask again for what is right.

"The wandering Jews" is an expression we hear all the time. We are the people of the Exodus. We are also wanderers because we are the people who had to leave nation after nation, facing expulsions, persecution, violence and more. Our history of wandering has led our people to occupy every corner of the globe. Many of our own families immigrated to Canada in search of their own "promised land," a place where opportunity and the freedom to be Jewish in safety and security would exist. We have asked and demanded, fought and sacrificed, for our freedom again and again.

We wanderers sympathize with others seeking safe passage and refuge. My congregation, like many, is sponsoring a family from Syria. We are now in a position not to ask for freedom, for what is right, but to act. In order to promote justice, we work together as Jews, as a community. And this is the meaning of the Exodus story.

Michael Walzer's book Exodus and Revolution describes three lessons we learn from Exodus. 1) Wherever you are it is probably Egypt. 2) There is hope for redemption/a Promised Land. 3) The only way to get there is by holding hands and marching. Together, we search for justice – for ourselves and for others. Together, we ensure hearts are never hardened against those seeking freedom. Together, we march on. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is spiritual leader of Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

As I booked my recent flight to Israel, I learned of a stabbing attack at the Jaffa Gate at the entrance to the Old City of Jerusalem. I swallowed hard. I have been at that very spot many times.

The victim was a beloved teacher at Aish HaTorah and is survived by a wife and seven children. When will this ever end? A similar narrative goes on in our Torah portion, as the Jews are bitterly enslaved in Egypt, and Moses turns to God and says, "Why have you treated this nation badly?"

God replies to him that the forefathers had many tests, but they never questioned God. There must be some lesson here for us.

Even though Moses believed in God's ways, he still cried out to God, "Why have you dealt badly with this nation?" On the one hand, God's answer stands, that even during such troubles, one should not question God. On the other hand, the complaint of Moses still remains, with a lesson: a Jew in this current exile, when it's so dark, needs to be strong in faith that all is for the good and that this darkness leads to redemption. On the other hand, we should cry out and ask, "Why? How much longer?" Or in the words of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, "We want Mashiach now!"

A Jew lives with these two different approaches. I will never forget the Rebbe's reaction after tragic events. He would cry out to God, "Why? For what benefit?" Yet in the same talk, he would ask us to redouble our efforts, to do more. Action. One more mitzvah. In our parshah, there seems to be no end to the bitter exile. Moses brought new hope to a depressed and dreamless nation. When Jews cry out from the bottom of their hearts, God listens. May we never lose our resolve and spirit. May we merit the coming of the Mashiach now. ■

Israel may be vulnerable to a new kind of terror-ISIS style

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

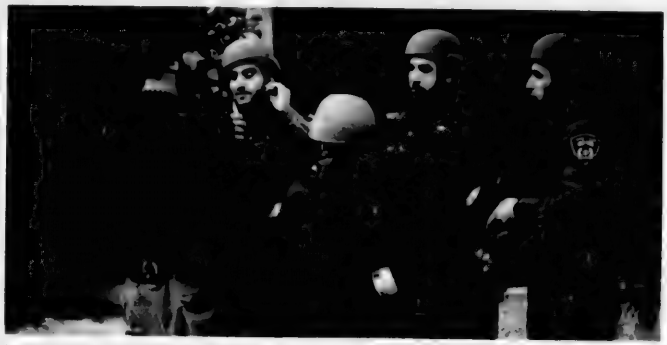
If the fatal Jan. 1 attack was indeed carried out by Nashat Milhem, a 29-year-old Israeli citizen from Arara, a village in northern Israel – as police suspect – then it is not part of the "third intifadah," or an attempt to identify with the Palestinians.

It's different in style, in method, in the attacker's flight from the scene. It wasn't a suicide attack, or the sort of self-sacrificial attacks that took place in 2001, when armed Palestinians would charge restaurants or other entertainment venues and shoot indiscriminately until they were shot dead.

No one has taken responsibility (at least thus far); nor has any organization gloried in the murder of innocents. It is not inconceivable that this latest terror attack is another "lone wolf" act – only this time, it may have been inspired by terror attacks carried out abroad under the ideological influence of ISIS (Islamic State).

The similarities to the Nov. 13 attacks that killed 130 in Paris are obvious: the perpetrator's flight, as well as his chosen target – young people sipping coffee on a bustling city street. It is clear that the terrorist intended to survive, and continues (at least thus far) to flee for his life.

Was Nashat Milhem inspired by ISIS?



Israeli security forces search for the gunman after a shooting attack at a pub in central Tel Aviv, on Jan. 1. Two people were killed in the shooting and several were injured. Police suspect a terror attack. PHOTO BY TOMER NEUBERG/FLASH90

Possibly. The Shin Bet busts cells or individuals planning to launch ISIS-inspired attacks on an almost weekly basis. ISIS succeeded in inspiring more than a few Arab Israelis to go fight in Syria and Iraq. It is possible others prefer to remain in Israel and murder apostates here, rather than make the long journey to the lands of ISIS. It is possible that, ultimately, someone from the Israeli Arab community will be able to evade and penetrate Israel's imperfect intelligence coverage in order to carry out an attack of this sort.

ISIS's own leader, Abu Bakr Baghdadi, emphasized the importance of the Palestinian theatre in his last public address, even vowing to attack the Jews, so it is not unreasonable to conclude that the speech may have inspired a few bad seeds in the Arab Israeli community, or even a single bad seed who reportedly already suffered from other problems, including a drug habit.

Milhem's family claimed he suffered from severe mental illness. Yet the method of the attack testifies to cool-headed planning far beyond what might be expected from someone purportedly suffering from severe mental illness: the choice of target, the theft of the firearm from his father, the shooting, the flight, the possible killing spree that followed (with the possible killing of cab driver Amin Shaaban about an hour after the attack), and his survival until now.

To be sure, the motive for the attack may have been more complex than straightforward ideological inspiration. The intersection of mental illness, religious radicalization and a troubled past (including a prison term for attempting to steal a soldier's firearm, a cousin killed by cops, drug use) may have created an especially dangerous mix. But the totality of his actions cannot be explained simply as mental illness or a psychotic break.

It is possible that Milhem's case exposes the extent to which the State of Israel may be vulnerable to a new kind of homebrew terror of the ISIS model. This is no longer just Europe's problem, or the Arab world's. Just as the jihadist group succeeded in "inspiring" Muslims in Paris, Germany and Belgium, it is certainly possible that it is succeeding in instilling hatred and inspiring violence among Muslims in Israel, and pushing these "lone wolves" to take up arms and murder Israelis – Jews and Muslims alike. ■

Three more people arrested for incitement at wedding

JTA
JERUSALEM

Three more people have been arrested in connection with a wedding where Jewish revellers were captured on video celebrating the deaths of members of a Palestinian family in a firebombing.

The three people, including one minor, reportedly were arrested by Israel police on Jan. 4, three weeks after the wedding video was broadcast on Israel's Channel 10. The minor reportedly was seen in the video dancing with a pistol. The three reportedly are being investigated for incitement and illegally handling firearms.

Five other suspects, including the groom Yakir Ashbal, were arrested last week and released.

Ashbal told Israel's Channel 10 last week after the release of the video that he did not see the activity captured on camera at his Jerusalem wedding, which had 600 guests.

The video shows friends of the suspected assailants in the July attack on a home in the Palestinian village of Duma that killed three members of the Dawabshe family – a toddler and his parents – stabbing a photo of the family and waving knives, rifles, pistols and Molotov cocktails. The revellers also chant the words to a song that includes a verse from Judges 16:28, in which Samson says, "Let me with one blow get revenge on the Philistines for my two eyes." The crowd substitutes "Palestinians" for Philistines.

Those shown in the video celebrating the deaths have been condemned from across Israel's political and religious spectrum.

An investigation was launched into the incident, even before the broadcast of the video on Dec. 23, by the Nationalistically Motivated Crimes Unit of the West Bank police. ■

Female Canadian rabbi hired by U.S. Orthodox synagogue

JTA
NEW YORK

The first graduate of Yeshivat Maharat to take the title "rabbi," a Canadian, said she has been hired by an unnamed American Orthodox synagogue.

Rabbi Lila Kagedan, who was ordained this summer by the seminary created by open Orthodox Rabbi Avi Weiss to train Orthodox female clergy, told the London-based Jewish Chronicle this week that she was recruited to join the staff of a congregation she declined to name.

Graduates of the New York seminary have so far eschewed taking the title rabbi, though the school is explicit that its mission is to train female Orthodox "clergy." Most have taken on the title maharat, an acronym that translates roughly to female spiritual leader.

Rabbi Lila Kagedan

Kagedan reportedly is the first graduate to call herself a rabbi.

In the interview with the Jewish Chronicle, Kagedan, who grew up in Ottawa, acknowledged that "change is difficult and frightening. We are very much used to a certain aesthetic when we say 'rabbi.'"

This fall, the Rabbinical Council of America, the main modern Orthodox rabbinical group, formally adopted a policy prohibiting the ordination or hiring of women rabbis. ■

Hillel Neuer: Jewish eyes on the United Nations

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Montreal-born Hillel Neuer walks softly, but carries a big microphone. Words are his currency, and as executive director of Geneva-based UN Watch, he brings them to bear against the dictatorships who wrap themselves in the protective cloaks of the United Nation's Human Rights Council. In 2013, he called those delegates, to their face, "the despots who run this council." Possessing four degrees, including one in comparative constitutional law from Hebrew University, he is a strong advocate for fair and equal treatment for the State of Israel.

Hillel Neuer

Has the number of UN resolutions critical of Israel changed over the years?

The General Assembly and Human Rights Council are mostly on autopilot, as are other UN agencies like UNESCO, when it comes to many votes, and particularly anti-Israel resolutions. Typically it's the same resolutions every year. They are sponsored by the Arab and Islamic states, with the Palestinians playing a key role. And they typically try to ratchet up the language to make it more inflammatory. November marked 40 years since the adoption of the infamous "Zionism is racism" resolution, which thankfully was repealed in 1991. But that really ushered in the era of the automatic condemnations of Israel. And we've been steady in recent years at 20 resolutions in New York and about five at the Human Rights Council in Geneva.

How did Canada's voting record under former prime minister Stephen Harper compare to those of the Jean Chrétien and Paul Martin governments?

The Martin government improved the balance from the Chrétien government. Canada had a more balanced record, opposing the most egregious, one-sided and inflammatory resolutions, where previously they might have abstained. They moved on a couple of things to a "No."

And then when Harper came in, we trended in a positive direction, even more so, most famously in Geneva at the Human Rights Council when Canada was a member from 2006 to 2009. Canada was the only country in the world that was voting "no" on a number of votes. That was something that stood out.

What do you expect from the Trudeau government?

Clearly this is a government that has a different approach to the United Nations. The Harper government was skeptical of the UN, and the Trudeau government has a more positive attitude. That's fine, provided that the Trudeau government will speak truth to power and stand up on principle.

We believe in the mission of the UN, but when the UN falls short of that mission, when the UN Human Rights Council chooses Saudi Arabia to chair a panel that selects human rights experts on issues like women's rights and judicial independence, that's a mockery of what the UN is meant to be and a mockery of Canadian values of a free and democratic society.

I hope and trust the Trudeau government will strengthen the UN by opposing those who seek to hijack that body and distort its founding mission and values.

Has the UN responded to the crises in Syria, Iraq and Crimea with the same level of resolutions directed at Israel?

Absolutely not. The case of Israel remains unique, and it continues to draw focus that is disproportionate to an extreme degree from what happens on the ground.

Syria was ignored for decades when President Bashar Assad's father, Hafez Assad, was murdering tens of thousands in Hama in the 1980s. Syria was re-elected repeatedly to the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations. Libya was made the chair of the HRC in 2003. Arab dictatorships were given a free pass. They were rewarded.

In 2011, Syria alienated the Sunni world, and you had an Alawite regime, which is part of the Shiite world, backed by Iran and Hezbollah, at war with the Sunnis. The Sunni regimes at the UN – Egypt, the Saudis, Jordan, the other Gulf countries – turned against Syria. That enabled the UN to criticize Syria on a number of occasions. But compared to how they criticize Israel and to what is happening on the ground, it's marginal. There is one resolution at the General Assembly on Syria. There's 20 on Israel. So that says it all.

The Palestinian flag was first raised at the UN around the same time PA President Mahmoud Abbas told the General Assembly the Palestinians were no longer bound by Oslo. What's the significance of those two events?

Well, you had that statement by Abbas showing contempt for signed international deals. But beyond that, in the past weeks, PA media are openly inciting to kill Jews, and the Palestinian media is glorifying the killers of Jews as martyrs and saying they are carrying out a sacred Islamic duty.

The response of the UN, besides a few passing, fleeting criticisms that were outweighed by far stronger condemnations of Israel, was to elevate and reward Abbas by raising the flag at the United Nations. It is outrageous that the UN, instead of holding the Palestinians to account, are treating them like children, not treating them as agents who can be held responsible for their actions. This only guarantees we'll have further bad acts by the PA government.

UN Watch revealed recently that 22 UNRWA teachers were inciting anti-Semitism. At first UNRWA denied it and later said there was some legitimacy to what you said, and disciplined those teachers. Is that response satisfactory?

We're gratified there was some acknowledgment by UNRWA of the basic facts. Anybody who goes on the Internet sees individuals who openly identify as UNRWA teachers posting photos of themselves in the classroom, and at the same time posting things in those same accounts showing pictures of Israelis being stabbed and encouraging murderous attacks against Jews. Saying for example, "stab Zionist dogs."

It's not a question of slapping them on the wrist. The best we have from UNRWA is acknowledging that some teachers had been suspended. What does that mean? Suspended for a day, a week, two weeks?

The response of UNRWA is unsatisfactory, to say the least. It's far worse than that. UNRWA's spokesman, Chris Gunness, has attacked UN Watch. He published a number of tweets urging journalists to ignore us, that we have no credibility. It's insufficient, and generally their attitude is one of contempt toward those of us trying to hold them accountable, and it's unacceptable. ■

Jews have faced BDS movement before

Backstory

EROL ARAF

"Judea Declares War on Germany" was the banner headline splashed across the front page of the British Daily Express on Friday, March 24, 1933. This is how the paper characterized the response of sensible Jews who decided to act against the Nazi movement singling out Jews for economic annihilation.

But other Jews took a different track: The Central Jewish Association of Germany rejected the notion that the Reich government was deliberately provoking anti-Jewish sentiments and even issued a statement of support on the grounds that the Hitler regime was "unaware" of the threatening situation emerging in Germany. The Board of Deputies of British Jews also opposed any attempt to boycott German goods on the basis that such policies were, quaintly stated, "unhelpful."

The idea behind the reticence of certain Jewish quarters over confronting Nazism also constituted the main platform of governments' minimalist approach to dealing with the gathering storms in Europe.

While Judea's war on German goods fizzled out in Europe, the Nazi anti-Jewish movement forged ahead: the SA (Nazi storm troopers) paraded in front of Jewish-owned stores lambasting shoppers; the yellow and black Star of David was painted on the windows, walls and doors of Jewish establishments and institutions; placards were placed and leaflets distributed urging shoppers not to "buy from Jews," as they were Germany's "misfortune," "occupying" the professions, "controlling the media and capital" and "enslaving" the German working class.

The Hitler regime also forced both private and public financial institutions to disinvest from Jewish-owned enterprises, withdrew research grants from Jewish university professors, prohibited scientists and academics from attending conferences, annulled their licences to practice their vocations and eventually removed them from German society, first professionally and later physically. In short, the Third Reich gave us the prototype of the current boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

Josef Goebbels made no secret of what was behind the Nazi BDS movement. It was nothing less than the economic dismemberment of German Jewry as prelude to "cleansing" the new Reich from the venomous Juden.

Given this history of boycott, divestment and sanctions directed at Jews in fascist or fascist-occupied Europe, one would think that singling out Israeli products made in contested territories for special labelling would resonate as an odious reminder of BDS's past. What makes the lamentable recent decision of the European Parliament and Commission to specially label products made in disputed lands particularly racist and discriminatory is the fact that Brussels does not impose similar restrictions on products from other occupied and disputed territories.

There are 189 territorial disputes worldwide where the occupation-liberation conundrum plays out with devastating consequences, including genocide, ethnic cleansing, rape, slavery and torture. From the smallest inhabited territorial dispute, the autonomous city of Ceuta between Spain and Morocco, to the largest, Tibet's occupation by China, we have many global jurisdictional disputes that have not been resolved.

Certain geographic conflicts have the potential for going nuclear, as in the case of Kashmir, where Pakistan and India face each other in an uneasy stalemate. On the genteel side of territorial disagreements, we have the dispute over Hans Island, an uninhabited barren knoll between Denmark and Canada, which remains unresolved today. Betwixt these two, the global breakdown of territorial disputes is as follows: in Africa there are 47; in Asia and Pacific, 58; in Europe, 23; in North America, 9; in South America and the Caribbean, 22; and 30 between UN-recognized member states and non-state actors.

The only territorial conflict among these 189 where ceding of territory, resulting in the restoration of the status quo ante, might pose a serious threat to the very existence of the relinquishing party is the case of Israel and the West Bank. That the distance from Qualqilla to the Mediterranean Sea is nine miles says everything that can be said as to why the UN Security Council did not consider the Armistice Lines of 1949 "defensible and recognized."

And that leaves one to wonder whether the day when Europe will place small yellow stars on Israeli avocados produced in Rosh Hanikra is not so far away. ■

Louis Whitehouse (born October 5, 1924 in Rozsály, Hungary; died December 22, 2015 in Toronto, Canada). He is survived by his best friend and companion, Susan Stevens; his daughter, Dot Whitehouse; his sister, Magda Berger (the late Harvey Berger); his many nieces and nephews and their families; and the newest light of his life, Sawyer Stevens. Louis was predeceased by his brother, Eugene Whitehouse (Agi Whitehouse), and his sister, Edith Weiss (the late Ernie Weiss). Louis was a Holocaust survivor who never failed to express his gratitude for the life he was able to create after coming to Canada. His chosen career in real estate and land development afforded him the opportunity to use his capacity for future-thinking, dreaming, and connecting people to help others realize their own visions and successes, as farms became communities and older areas were renewed. A devout man, he found both a spiritual and intellectual home at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto where he engaged with a welcoming community in the study and practice of his faith, as well as his passion for ancient history. A modest and humble man, Louis was known for quietly helping others without seeking attention for himself. To the end, he was surprised at how many people genuinely cared about him, at how many lives he had touched. Our family would like to thank the staff of both the Assess and Restore program and the Palliative Care Unit of Bridgepoint Health for their tender care. Memorial donations in Louis' honour may be made to the Beth Tzedec Synagogue (Toronto) Adult Education Program. Shiva private.

Writer's book inspired Spielberg, and video responds to high school book ban

Journalist George Jonas dead at 80

Hungarian-born conservative Jewish author and columnist George Jonas died Jan. 10 at age 80 after an extended illness. Jonas came to Canada in 1956 after the Hungarian Uprising and was a producer for more than three decades at the CBC, where he was best known for working with lawyer Eddie Greenspan on the TV crime series Scales of Justice. Jonas' 18 books included Vengeance, about the Israeli hit team that assassinated the planners of the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre, which Steven Spielberg adapted for his 2005 film Munich. Jonas, who in recent years was a National Post columnist, was married three times, including from 1974 to 1979 to journalist Barbara Amiel. He was named to the Order of Canada 2014.

When a kiss isn't just a kiss

In response to a controversial decision by Israel's Education Ministry to exclude a book about a Jewish-Palestinian romance from the high school reading list, an Israeli magazine posted a video of Israelis and Palestinians kissing, echoing a provocative 2014 viral video of strangers kissing. Time Out Tel Aviv's video features six couples who'd never kissed before. Some were friends, some had never met. The novel, Borderlife by Israeli Dorit Rabinyan, was left off the literature curriculum last month despite an advisory panel's recommendation. The story made headlines worldwide, and the book has since become a best-seller in Israel. The video was also removed from Facebook, presumably due to user complaints, Ha'aretz reported.

Apparently, this is controversial.

Journalist stabbed in vest test

An Israeli TV reporter was wounded Jan. 6 while testing a vest that its maker said would protect IDF soldiers from knife attacks. Manufacturer FMS Enterprises Migun asked Channel 1's Eitam Lachover to test the vest, which is made of semi-hard plastic and is supposed to protect the neck and soldier blades, areas not covered by soldiers' bulletproof vests. Lachover received stitches after a knife penetrated the vest. The news item aired that evening, and the company's shares plummeted after the incident, though the vest proved its worth in a similar test on Israel's Channel 10. ■

Saving Danish Jews

I very much enjoy reading The Canadian Jewish News, as there are so many interesting and informative articles.

I need to point out to you, however, that an error crept into a book review of The Boys Who Challenged Hitler ("Books serve as enlightening gifts for Festival of Lights," Dec. 3). The reviewer stated that "ultimately tiny Denmark helped save 700,000 Jews from being delivered to German death camps." The number of Danish Jews saved by their Danish rescuers is actually slightly over 7,000.

Bert Raphael writes of his concerns about Syrians arriving in Canada bringing with them their anti-Semitic and anti-Israel sentiments, which are taught in the Syrian Muslim school system ("Welcoming Syrian refugees," Dec. 24).

I, too, am worried! I worry about how intensive the precautions are that our government is taking to investigate the backgrounds of these asylum seekers, their real names at birth, the past involvement in any of the myriad branches of the secret police, the army intelligence services, and the facilities available to obtain false passports in the areas in which they are temporarily housed.

In the 28 years of my involvement in the "secret rescue" of the Jewish community from Syria, I, as chairman of the national committee for Jews in Arab lands of the former Canadian Jewish Congress, was refused by the then-Liberal governments, to bring in even one Jew from Syria into Canada.

Obviously, the present Liberal government's attitude has changed considerably and will hopefully allow the suffering and beleaguered members of the Yazidi and the Syrian Christian communities entrance and citizenship in this country.

The message from campus

As a member of the board of directors of StandWithUs Canada, the Canadian affiliate of the international Israel education and advocacy organization, we have some facts to include in the discussion about "How bad is it on campus? Depends on who you ask," (Dec. 17).

Unfortunately, the vicious boycott, divestment, sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel, presented at times as a mere fringe group in the article, actually has far-reaching and very concerning results.

When Israeli academics and professionals are being disinvited to international conferences, and worse, when fallacies about Israel are being spread around campuses without anybody countering them with facts, generations of students (Jewish and non-Jewish) are becoming dangerously misinformed.

And although as stated, many Jewish students are not impacted by the tension that surrounds a motion by their student union to condemn Israel, as a community, we have a responsibility to ensure that not one Jewish student is feeling harassed on campus because of his or her religion. Too often, Jewish students are now the target of anti-Israel bullying and intimidation, and in some cases, grade reprisals.

How much more difficult will our lives as Canadian Jews be in a few years if even a fraction of our future policy-makers graduate with misinformed, negative views of Israel?

The "fringe group of people" mentioned at McMaster University are the BDS proponents of the student union who humiliated pro-Israel students when they overwhelmingly passed a BDS motion against Israel. The fact is, 12 BDS motions had been passed by student unions by 2014.

Since StandWithUs Canada launched three years ago, five motions have been defeated. We believe that providing student leaders with the intensive training and professional strategies to stand up confidently and effectively in support of Israel makes a difference.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Crossing denominational lines

Jews are part of one people above and beyond our differences, and we become a greater whole when we stop seeing our brothers and sisters as 'the other'

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: I'm leaving soon for the annual Wexner Alumni Conference, which gathers rabbis, cantors, educators, and Jewish community professionals from across North America and beyond.

One of the aspects of the fellowship that I value most is that it brings together Jews of all different denominations (and none). It's an opportunity for collegiality in the deepest sense and a chance to ask the big questions of Jewish life across the lines that often divide us.

Here in Montreal, I am grateful for my colleagues across denominations as well, and our ability to come together on the Montreal Board of Rabbis. What's your experience of cross-denominational relationships in Toronto?

Rabbi Korobkin: I'm also grateful for the opportunity to liaise with colleagues from the different movements. I find that while we may often disagree on how to approach religious issues, there is so much that we can work on together for the sake of the larger Jewish community.

Here in Toronto, there is a rich history of Orthodox rabbis having real and meaningful friendships with their non-Orthodox counterparts. In more recent years, however, this open corridor seems to have been sealed. Some in my community have even been critical of me for having this ongoing written dialogue with you, in their perception that by doing so, I'm "elevating" you and granting you "legitimacy."

Clearly, I disagree with their perceptions. Your legitimacy cannot be granted or rescinded by any person.

Rabbi Grushcow: It saddens me to hear of these attacks, and I'm glad you continue our dialogue regardless.

From the other end of the spectrum, I sometimes find that in Reform communities there can be over-generalizations about Orthodoxy. Most of all, I've encountered the assumption that all Orthodox Jews think all Reform Jews are bad Jews, or not even Jewish.

I try to teach that we are part of one people above and beyond our differences, and that it is better to encounter than assume. I wonder what, beyond our dialogue, we can do to encourage these connections.

Rabbi Korobkin: Misperceptions abound. It's not just Orthodox versus Reform. It's Sephardi versus Ashkenazi, modern Orthodox versus haredi, Hungarian Jew versus Polish Jew, politically liberal versus conservative, etc. When we stop seeing our brother or sister as "the other," we are all enriched and become a greater whole.

Is there more we can do? Of course. One project some BAYT members do in December is to feed the homeless in collaboration with Temple Har Zion, a Reform congregation. But we can, and should, be doing more. The more points of access we can create between our various communities, the stronger we will all be.

Rabbi Grushcow: Co-operation on social justice issues is a good starting point. I would also love to see ways for us to visit each other's synagogues, learn from each other's rabbis, study Torah together, and even share Shabbat, without falling back on the belief that there is only one right way. It's not easy, but neither is it impossible.

I'll be honest: growing up as a Conservative Jew in Toronto, we called Holy Blossom "the church on the hill." Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, where I now have the privilege of serving as rabbi, was sometimes called "the church on Sherbrooke Street" by other Montreal Jews. From the other side, "black hats" can be a term used in a derogatory way, which distances us from each other.

One more easy step could be following the mitzvah of shmirat halashon, speaking of one another with respect and care.

Rabbi Korobkin: How right you are! It's often been said that we paint the median line of the religion road exactly where we find ourselves – everyone to my left is inauthentic, everyone to my right is a fanatic.

I don't agree with your way in Judaism. But you are my sister, and that's what really counts. Changing the way we speak about our fellow Jew sounds so simple. Yet the temptation to disparage the other is a weakness to which so many of us succumb, even among the most observant.

I find that the people who speak the least amount of lashon hara are also the most secure in their own identity, religious or otherwise. Perhaps we, together with our readership, can be part of that small revolution for change. ■

Every winter, we like to go down south. Who needs the cold at our age? Last year, we signed up for the Benjamin's Funeral Service Listings email. It gives us peace of mind to know that if someone in our community dies, we won't miss the chance to send our condolences. Benjamin's updates us every day – a free service that helps us stay in touch.

Israelis participate in the No Pants Subway Ride event, on Jan. 11, an annual tradition that started in New York in 2002, and is now a global event. Dozens of people boarded the Jerusalem Light Train wearing no trousers. The pantless ride was according to the organizers, a bit of fun in a city that "really needs it."

From Yoni's Desk

There's a limit to everything

By Nehemia Gershuni-Aylho's count, there were more than 100 incidents of terror and violence directed against Israel's Jewish citizens and the country's security forces in the first five days of 2016 alone.

A data analyst gaining recognition for his statistical studies of Israel's politics and security environment, Gershuni-Aylho is meticulous in his analyses – he graphed, for example, an analysis of 3,672 individual terror attacks in 2015 with such detail that viewers can see what sort of attacks were most prevalent (stone throwings, by a wide margin), the age of the attackers (most were in the 18-21 range) and even which days of the week were more likely to see terror incidents (Friday, followed by Sunday).

Gershuni-Aylho's work paints a numerical portrait of a country battling terrorism, unable, as yet, to quell the violence. But while Israelis are understandably on edge, and even as security across the country is necessarily being tightened to stop these attacks, some are nonetheless reacting in concerning ways, as two recent examples suggest.

On Jan. 6 in Athens, an Aegean Airlines flight to Tel Aviv was delayed after Jewish Israeli passengers alleged that two Arabs aboard the plane were terrorists. When security personnel re-checked their documents, they found no cause for concern, but even so, as many as 60 or 70 passengers reportedly refused to take their seats. Eventually, the Arab men agreed to leave the plane. One of the Jewish passengers said the Arabs appeared "scary." "We're entitled to express our concerns," he added.

Two days earlier, Israel's Channel 10 aired footage of a Jewish resident of Afula threatening "consequences" if Arabs moved to the northern city. When asked whether Arabs should fear for their lives, he answered "Yes." "We don't have any problem with the Arabs," a woman added. "But everyone should just watch over their own territory, and everyone will have a good life." The man, addressing an Arab interviewee, put it differently. "I don't want you here," he said.

These incidents are not the norm in Israel, where in spite of everything, people rarely descend into blatant xenophobia. And on those few occasions when they do, you can always count on Jewish voices to be among the first to denounce those sorts of reactions as antithetical to Judaism and unrepresentative of Israelis and Jews around the world. Still, these events are a stark reminder that in order to be a light unto the nations, we must be a light unto ourselves.

Ruti Tehrani, a 54-year-old bus driver in Tel Aviv, clearly understands that. Last week, she was driving the Tel Aviv-to-Petach Tikvah route when Jewish passengers demanded an Arab man on the bus be removed. Tehrani investigated the situation and discovered that the man was ill, not, as some passengers claimed, acting suspiciously. She refused to move him and told the complainants that they could exit the bus if they were still concerned. According to reports, more than a few did.

"Here… everyone's equal – Jews and Arabs," Tehrani later told Israel's Channel 2. "My upbringing was to respect everyone and not discriminate against anyone."

"I'm aware of the current security situation, but there's a limit to everything." ■ — YONI

ESSAY

In Israel, Jewish parliamentarians learn from each other

Anthony Housefather

In late December, I attended my first international conference as a member of Parliament. The International Conference of Jewish Parliamentarians, sponsored by the World Jewish Congress, met in Jerusalem over a three-day period.

Irwin Cotler and I represented Canada, and we were joined by members of the U.S. Congress, members of the Knesset and parliamentarians from countries such as France, Belgium, Chile, Brazil, Ukraine, Romania and Hungary. As a group, we were able to meet with representatives from across the spectrum of Israeli politics, including those from different parties within the governing coalition and those in the opposition. We also met with members of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's team and the leaders in the Foreign Ministry.

Engaging with both governing and opposition politicians and senior civil servants allowed us to look past partisanship and foster an open dialogue that allowed for substantive discussion on such issues as the peace process, Islamic State (ISIS), Iran, the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement and labelling requirements, and the relationship between Jewish communities in Israel and the Diaspora. We also had the chance to meet with some Israeli entrepreneurs and appreciate the genius of a tiny country that had more venture capital investment than any of its European neighbours in the last year.

During the course of the meetings, we had the opportunity as Jewish parliamentarians to discuss and learn from one another as to how we individually and our political parties and countries were handling such issues as BDS and the Iranian nuclear agreement from both a legislative and an advocacy framework.

A particularly noteworthy portion of the discussions related to the strong belief amongst Israelis that there is a true opportunity to improve relationships between Israel and several Arab and Muslim states. While there was very little enthusiasm for discussion with the Palestinian Authority, and almost no feeling that such discussions would lead to a lasting peace, the twin threats of ISIS and Iran have given Israel and many Arab and Muslim states a common enemy.

As such, the prospects for improved relations with Turkey, Jordan, Egypt, and the creation of relationships with the Gulf States are opportunities that cannot be missed. These improved ties within the region could ease security concerns and foster greater security interdependence while strengthening the front against regional threats such as ISIS and Iran. Canada can and should be at the forefront of facilitating this dialogue.

Another thought-provoking thread of discussion revolved around the relationship between Israel and Diaspora Jews. I came away from the meeting noting that Israel has now revised its view of the Diaspora. At one time, Diaspora Jews were seen almost purely as a source of money and immigrants for Israel. But the Israelis we met took great pains to tell us this attitude has now shifted to the recognition of the importance of a strong Jewish Diaspora. There is an understanding amongst many Israelis that Israel, which is so conscious of national security, needs the message of pluralism and social conscience that comes from Jews in the Diaspora. Both of these are quintessential parts of the Jewish experience in countries like Canada.

But we in the Diaspora also need to be reminded of Israelis' fears about national security. Given what Israelis live through on a daily basis and their knowledge of the military and counter-terrorism, the constant suspicion of threat is understandable. As the West faces new dangers from organizations such as ISIS, there are lessons we can also learn from the Israelis who manage to live normally in one of the most dangerous regions of the world.

As a Canadian Jew, I was keen to learn from other Jewish parliamentarians in the Diaspora about the challenges they faced in their own countries, both as members of a religious minority and on advocacy issues. Their challenges reminded me how fortunate we are to live in Canada.

I look forward to briefing my colleagues on these meetings and working with my colleagues from all parties to ensure Canada continues to take a leadership role against BDS and labelling requirements which single out Israel, continuing with Iran Accountability Week in May, and working to make sure that, where possible, we undertake concerted efforts to help Israel improve relations with other states. ■

Can Tories hold on to Jewish voters?

After an election loss, many say the Conservatives can still count on strong support in the community

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Two or three elections ago, Bonnie Bereskin was canvassing door to door in Toronto's York Centre riding for then-Conservative candidate Michael Mostyn. York Centre was a longtime Liberal stronghold, represented at the time by high profile MP Ken Dryden. She knew she was in for a tough sell, but she was shocked when she heard, on more than one occasion, Conservative leader Stephen Harper and his Alberta cohorts described as Nazis.

The soon-to-be prime minister was called other names of less disrepute, but the mistrust, if not outright contempt, for the Tory leader surprised her. She was originally from Alberta, where Conservatives had governed the province for many years, during which the Jewish community was treated well – unlike Ontario, Alberta provided funding to religious schools – and Israel was held in high regard.

So she couldn't quite make sense of the level of animosity to the Tory brand. Of course, that was after Liberal cabinet minister Elinor Caplan had accused the Canadian Alliance, one of the forerunners of the Conservative party, of having supporters who "are Holocaust deniers, prominent bigots and racists."

Despite the negative messaging, Bereskin believes she and other Tory workers laid the groundwork at the time for a swing in the riding. In 2011, York Centre turned Tory blue as Mark Adler unseated Dryden to bring the riding into the Conservative fold for the first time since 1962.

In 2015, the riding swung back to Liberal red, as did Eglinton-Lawrence, immediately to the south, where finance minister Joe Oliver was defeated. Both are home to substantial Jewish populations. In a pre-election online poll conducted by The CJN, 44 per cent of respondents said they favoured Harper and the Tories – a total greater than the 32 per cent of the national vote they received in 2015.

Just north of Toronto, Thornhill, the riding with the largest concentration of Jews in Canada, returned Tory Peter Kent in 2015, as it did in 2011.

Israel's PM Benjamin Netanyahu with Stephen Harper in Ottawa in 2010. Harper's support for Israel has been cited as one reason Jews have voted for the Conservative party. FILE PHOTO

It's a truism that for decades, if not generations, Jews had supported parties of the left, mostly Liberals, and to a lesser extent, New Democrats. That seems to have changed in the last few years. Harper's vigorous support for Israel during the 2006 war with Hezbollah and two conflicts in Gaza, as well as a pro-Israel voting record at the United Nations and its lead in walking out of the second UN anti-racism conference in 2009 (which was shaping up to be like its anti-Israel predecessor), solidified Jewish support for the Conservatives. Tory candidates and senior ministers often repeated the phrase that the government supported Israel through fire and water.

In 2015, Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau fought hard for those Jewish votes, repeatedly emphasizing that there was no daylight between Liberals and Conservatives in their support for Israel.

But Jewish Conservatives believe the last 10 years have marked a major change in the kind of support the Tories can expect from Jewish voters going forward. Voting for the Conservatives has been normalized, and not just because of the party's support for Israel, they say.

"I'm a Conservative for the party's economic principles," Bereskin said, pointing to a belief in smaller government, individual responsibility and personal freedom. "Support for Israel is helpful, but it wasn't the reason I support the Conservatives."

Bereskin, a member of the egalitarian Reconstructionist Darchei Noam Synagogue in Toronto, described herself as being on the libertarian end of the political spectrum. Jews have in the past voted overwhelmingly for the Liberals, but "you can be Jewish and adopt Conservative values and ensure support for Israel," she said.

Steven Slimovitch is a criminal defence lawyer in Montreal. In the past election, he supported Conservative candidate Robert Libman's bid to win longtime Liberal stronghold Mount Royal, which Anthony Housefather retained for the party. "I have been a lifelong Liberal supporter, and I began to lose favour with the Liberal government because of their policy toward Israel and Jewish questions in general," he said.

Slimovitch referred to the failure to prosecute Nazi war criminals and to Canada's voting record at the UN as factors in his decision.

He pointed to "Mr. Harper's overwhelming and strong backing of Israel."

Slimovitch, who is national counsel to B'nai Brith Canada, said Jews don't vote as a bloc – for some, domestic issues trump concerns over support for Israel; for others, it's the other way around.

But there's been a change over the years in the way Jews see the two major parties, he continued. Support for the Conservatives has grown among Jews "as people became more well off and comfortable in society.

"The Tories were always perceived as the party of another place," he said.

"As time goes on and as people began to see the policy that the Conservatives put into place for Israel, things changed."

Gary Shapiro also supported Libman in the last election. In fact, he serves on the executive of the local Conservative riding association. But his family were strong Liberal supporters going back a couple of generations. His grandparents voted Liberal, as did his parents. He began to move away from the Liberals, whom he saw as trying to be all things to all people, and moved to the Tories, because of Harper's "backbone, strength of character" and principled support of Israel.

An Open Letter from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Morris Perlis
Chair of the Board

Bruce Leboff
Senior Vice-Chair

Morris Zbar
President & CEO

As UJA Federation of Greater Toronto readies to celebrate its Centennial next year, the organization continues to do what it has done since its inception in 1917, look to the future on behalf of the citizens of Jewish Toronto.

Together, with your help, we have built a community characterized by vibrancy, diversity, creativity, tolerance and success, but in a world with ever-evolving challenges, we simply can't afford to rest on our laurels.

It is time for a period of renewal. To that end, UJA Federation recently developed a strategic plan to chart the course of our Jewish community for years to come.

Over the fall of 2014 and the winter of 2015, we started a conversation with Jewish Torontonians about the role that they want UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to play in strengthening this community - their community. A steering committee that reflects the diversity of our community spearheaded a process that saw us reach out to as large and diverse an audience as possible – with over 400 in-person interviews and over 1,300 online submissions.

Each consultation and submission provided valuable insights which will help us in shaping the future direction of UJA Federation, and, by extension, the future of Jewish Toronto. During this process, six essential priorities were identified by members of the community, each of which will be our focus for change over the next five years. Those priorities are:

- Caring for the vulnerable
- Forging strong connections with Israel
- Advocating on behalf of Israel, the Jewish People and Canadian values
- Galvanizing the community whether in times of crisis or celebration
- Inspiring our younger generations to embrace Jewish life and to ensure a Jewish future
- Maintaining Toronto's position as a leader in Jewish education

As our community continues to evolve and grow, so too must UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and we have proven over the years that there is no more powerful way to make positive changes than when we act together.

We are blessed to have generous donors, talented community leaders and a network of more than 100 effective partner agencies. Nonetheless, there is strength in numbers and this ambitious plan will only work if you accept our invitation to join in renewing UJA Federation and the community it serves.

We hope you will visit JewishToronto.com/strategicplan.

To learn more about our plan and if you have any feedback, please contact us at stratplan@ujafed.org.

We look forward to hearing from you as we take the next steps together on this journey.

When your mom dies

Avrum Rosensweig

In memory of Gitel Rosensweig, 1930-2015

When your mom dies, you are an orphan.

When your mom dies, there is nobody to yell down the block (in earshot of your friends) at 7 p.m., "Time to come home and go to bed."

When your mom dies, who will pick you up from school?

When your mom dies, your clothes always seem to be wrinkled and full of stains.

When your mom dies, you don't know who will take on all the bullies on your block.

When your mom dies, it's difficult to find someone who will convince your school principal you really are the best kid ever.

When your mom dies, the first eshet chayil – woman of valour – you ever knew is gone.

When your mom dies, it's hard to find that kind of love that is silky and follows you into every foxhole of life.

When your mom dies, you miss the type of compliments only she can pay.

When your mom dies, there is nobody around to spot you a twenty when your cash is low.

When your mom dies, you need to find a babysitter who gets paid.

When your mom dies, nobody sends over brisket for supper anymore.

When your mom dies, nobody knows you are perfect anymore.

When your mom dies, there is nobody to watch old movies with.

When your mom dies, the hecklers in the crowd when you speak go unchecked.

When your mom dies, Kaddish brings tears to your eyes.

When your mom dies, it becomes nearly impossible to close that huge gaping hole in your soul. And that firm ground you used to walk on is no longer there.

> Losing your mom is somehow a kick in the gut unlike any other

When your mom dies, so does a big piece of you. When your mom dies…

Gitel Rosensweig left our earth early in the morning on Dec. 8. She left behind a village of children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and community kids who loved her dearly and called her Bubbie.

Many years ago, after my father died, we flew to Israel to bury him in a cemetery in the beautiful Jerusalem hills. When our El Al plane landed, my mother, a young widow, hurried to her feet and asked an old Russian Jewish woman who had arrived in Israel to make it her home (during Operation Exodus, the campaign to rescue former Soviet Jews) if she could help her down the stairs. The woman thanked her and took her arm. I watched them walk hand-in-hand down the aisle and then descend the stairs onto the tarmac, shmoozing in Yiddish as they went.

I thought at the time how magnificent it was that my mom who had just lost the apple of her eye, my father, had the wherewithal to help an elderly woman in need. I have often told this story in public as a way to express thanks for my tikkun olam (repairing the world) roots, naches in my mom and appreciation for being her boy.

We all experience loss, and it is sometimes tragic, but losing your mom is somehow a kick in the gut unlike any other, and you're left feeling so alone, like a kid waiting and waiting as the sun goes down, in the cold of winter, to be picked up and snuggled and loved.

Rest in peace, Mom. Thank you. Job well done! ■

A tale of two menorah lightings

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

It turned out to be a farce. Our community menorah was vandalized on the first night of Chanukah, hours after the annual menorah lighting. In the course of an afternoon, a special menorah lighting for the second night was organized. Hundreds arrived in solidarity, and New York Mayor Bill de Blasio and other political leaders attended. The message on the second night was clear: New York City will not tolerate intolerance. This evening of solidarity was wonderful, except for one problem: the vandalism had nothing to do with anti-Semitism. A few days later, a 14-year-old was arrested. He said he'd vandalized the menorah because he was "bored." In retrospect, it was much ado about nothing, a rally against an anti-Semitic act that never was.

This phantom hate crime raises a complicated subject: anti-Semitism. It's hard for many to recognize that anti-Semitism is no longer an existential threat for North American Jews. (The situation is very different for European Jews). To be clear, anti-Semitism is a serious issue for all Canadians and Americans, just like any act of racism. Democracies must react forcefully to prevent prejudice from spreading. But anti-Semitism is no longer the primary challenge facing North American Jews. George Washington hoped that "the children of the stock of Abraham" would "merit and enjoy the goodwill of the other inhabitants." That is certainly the case in 2015. Jews in North America are established, admired and affluent. Yet despite all the good news, our community is shrinking rapidly.

Today, the greatest threat to Jewish life is assimilation. The people who show the least enthusiasm for Judaism are the ones who matter most: young Jews. The 2013 Pew report on U.S. Jews reported that 32 per cent of Jews 35 and younger identify themselves as Jews "with no religion." Exactly at the moment when we've overcome historic struggles with discrimination and hatred, we find ourselves facing an even greater test: acceptance.

Acceptance is the Achilles heel of the Jewish community. In medieval Europe, Jews in northern countries experienced greater persecution than their peers in Spain, yet Spanish Jews were more likely to convert out of Judaism. Paradoxically, Jews have found it easier to keep their Jewish identity when it was difficult to be a Jew. To paraphrase Rabbi Ovadiah Sforno, success is also a test. And for American Jews, success is turning out to be a greater challenge to Jewish identity than persecution.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks jokes that the best way to fill up synagogues would be by putting up large signs outside declaring "no Jews allowed," because contemporary Jews would be certain to join any institution that would refuse them membership. He's absolutely correct. We have made our way into restricted country clubs and now thrive in once-restricted neighbourhoods. But what are we going to do about assimilation?

While there are no quick fixes for assimilation, the annual menorah lighting is part of the solution. This program, sponsored by Chabad and the KJ Beginner's program, has one simple assumption: that even one Chanukah candle can open the door to a meaningful Jewish identity. And engagement initiatives like this have had a wide-ranging effect on American Jews.

American Jewish history is the tale of these two menorah lightings. One story is the 350-year battle against anti-Semitic prejudices, a heartwarming story of refugees from other countries finding full acceptance in the United States and Canada. That was on full display when de Blasio attended the second menorah lighting. But the story of the 21st-century Jewish community, one that remains to be written, is whether Judaism can continue to compete for the hearts and minds of young Jews. While it's wonderful that the mayor lit the menorah on the second night of Chanukah, our future depends on whether we will be able to inspire the next generation of Jews to light the menorah all eight nights of Chanukah. ■

Canada has no chief rabbi, thank God

Rabbi Dow Marmur

The vocation of a rabbi is to teach Torah and live by its precepts. To be a chief rabbi is to dabble in politics. That's why the office often diminishes the person who holds it. Jewish tradition doesn't know of chief rabbis. It respects rabbis not by the office they hold but by the people they are, their level of learning and the humanity that informs their relationships.

Even Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, arguably the most articulate and impressive exponent of contemporary Judaism in general and modern Orthodoxy in particular, didn't exactly shine as Britain's chief rabbi. Mercifully, he retired in time to recover his deserved stature and reputation.

Rabbi David Lau is neither a Rabbi Sacks nor a Rabbi Benny Lau, his first cousin and one of the most persuasive rabbis, teachers and scholars in Israel today. Before Rabbi David Lau assumed his present office, he was rabbi of Modi'in, a growing town halfway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, and was appreciated for his moderation and his humanity. I'd watch him often on Friday afternoons on Israeli TV, when he answered halachic questions. I was impressed by his understanding of human beings and his gentle way of exposing them to Jewish law.

On a visit to the United States not long before he was elevated to what some regard as high office, Rabbi Lau met with lay and rabbinic federation leaders from all streams of Judaism. He described himself as "your brother in Israel." In the course of that visit, he also went to a pluralistic Jewish day school in Washington D.C., where he told the students, "You are Jewish life in this city."

All that goodwill seems to have evaporated when he was appointed Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, following, like his current Sephardi counterpart, in the footsteps of his father.

A recent example of the younger Rabbi Lau's change of attitude is reflected in his attack on Israel's education minister, Naftali Bennett, who is also the minister of Diaspora affairs. Rabbi Lau strongly criticized Bennett for recently visiting the Solomon Schechter (Conservative) Day School in New York City, which, by all accounts, isn't very different from the one Rabbi Lau visited in Washington.

Critical reactions to his attack on Bennett came from many quarters. The most cogent was in the Jerusalem Post by Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, another significant and open Orthodox rabbi in the country. Rabbi Riskin reminded readers that "Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, the greatest halachic decisor in 20th-century America, ruled that Orthodox rabbis may teach in Conservative day schools and Hebrew schools."

What's good for Orthodox rabbis in America is, according to Rabbi Lau, not good enough for Israel's minister of education and Diaspora affairs.

Rabbi Riskin lamented: "How far the present chief rabbis of Israel have wandered from the inclusive vision of our first chief rabbi, Rabbi Yitzchak Hacohen Kook" (1865-1935). A self-confident strong individual can overcome the limitations of petty politics imposed by the office. Rabbi Kook's biography testifies to it.

That was also my experience in Britain, where I had the privilege to get to know and collaborate with the late Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits (1921-1999), Rabbi Sacks' predecessor in office. The pressures on Rabbi Jakobovits were enormous. His colleagues who claimed the franchise on Jewish law saw non-Orthodox exponents of Judaism as sworn enemies. Yet he withstood the pull to the far right during much of his tenure and remained determined to represent the entire community.

If, contrary to tradition but in compliance with the institution created by the British during their mandate in Palestine, Orthodoxy in Israel wants to appoint a figure to fulfil the role of an archbishop, it should at least choose someone who can match the vision, the humanity and the independence of spirit of Pope Francis.

Since that's unlikely to happen anywhere, alas, Jewish communities that aren't burdened by chief rabbis are fortunate. Canada is one of them, thank God. ■

Focus on ISIS is obscuring Iranian threat to Israel

Sheryl Saperia

Palestinians are stabbing, shooting and ramming cars into Israelis on a daily basis. According to a recent survey by the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, two-thirds of Palestinians back the current wave of terror stabbings against Israelis, while the same percentage support a larger armed uprising.

Amid these daily assaults in Israel, as well as the Paris attacks, reports that ISIS is "preparing the largest religious cleansing in history," as well as about mass slaughter of civilians in Syria and Iran's testing of ballistic missiles in contravention of multiple UN resolutions, the UN General Assembly saw fit on a single day last fall to adopt six non-binding resolutions criticizing Israel.

This singling out of Israel is an example of what former justice minister Irwin Cotler describes as a "new, sophisticated, virulent" strain of anti-Semitism involving "the discrimination against, denial of, or assault upon the right of the Jewish People to live as an equal member of the international community, with the state of Israel as the targeted collective Jew among the nations."

A small country comprising 0.11 per cent of the world's population, Israel attracts a disproportionate amount of the world's attention and animosity. Through terror plots both thwarted and successful, the Jewish state is relentlessly reminded of the existential pressure it faces to be stronger and smarter than its adversaries.

It must, therefore, be gratifying for the Israel Defence Forces to learn that while the world galvanizes against ISIS, the terrorist group is apparently scared of only one country: Israel.

Jürgen Todenhöfer, a former member of the German Parliament, is the first western journalist to be granted significant access to ISIS territory and come home safely. After his 2014 trip, he published a book titled My 10 Days in the Islamic State. He recently said in a media interview that the "only country ISIS fears is Israel." He elaborated: "They think they can defeat U.S. and U.K. ground troops, who they say they have no experience in city guerrilla or terrorist strategies. But they know the Israelis are very tough as far as fighting against guerrillas and terrorists."

> An Iranian nuclear bomb is the most significant threat to Israel.

What, then, to make of the message from ISIS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, released at the close of 2015? "Jews," he warned, "you will not enjoy in Palestine. God has gathered you in Palestine so that the mujahedeen can reach you soon, and you will hide by the rock and the tree. Palestine will be your graveyard." The going wisdom is the recording was intended to boost ISIS' popularity in the Arab world, after criticism the group is fighting Muslims rather than Jews and neglecting the Palestinian struggle. Israel is still perceived to be a low priority for an ISIS attack.

The Islamic State's caution in this regard is consistent with Israel's confidence in defending itself against the notorious terrorist organization. Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon has said that despite sharing borders with areas where the group is active, such as Sinai and the Golan Heights, his country is not significantly threatened by ISIS. "The Islamic State hasn't opened a front against us, because they would simply get hurt," Ya'alon declared.

Iran, on the other hand, is a major source of concern for Israel. Former head of IDF intelligence Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin admitted that an Iranian nuclear bomb is the most significant threat to Israel. Ya'alon expressed worry about Iran's presence in Syria: "Iran's Quds Force is currently the only source actively working in Syria to attack us, trying to smuggle weapons and run messengers."

Indeed, the world's current focus on ISIS may be obscuring the true long-term threats presented by state sponsors of terror such as Iran, which has the land, resources and newfound legitimacy to pursue its agenda. If the West is truly committed to countering terrorist groups in the Middle East, advice should be heeded from the sole democracy in the region with unsurpassed counterterrorism expertise: Israel. ■

Left-wing Canadian Zionist groups are adding their voices to the outcry against controversial proposed Israeli legislation that would force NGOs to disclose if more than half their funding comes from foreign sources.

The so-called "NGO bill" was proposed by Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked of the nationalist Jewish Home party and was unanimously approved at the end of December by the Knesset's ministerial committee for legislation. It would require any Israeli non-governmental organization that receives more than half of its funding from foreign governments to disclose this fact in written communications with elected officials, declare it when meeting in places public officials gather, and indicate it – in the form of badges worn by its representatives – when attending sessions in the Knesset.

Groups such as JSpace Canada, the New Israel Fund of Canada and Canadian Friends of Peace Now have expressed deep concern over the cabinet-endorsed bill, which critics in Israel and abroad say is an attempt by the Israeli government to target left-wing NGOs.

"The bill appears to be so blatantly discriminatory in terms of singling out only NGOs that are critical of [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's policies that it flies in the face of equality and social justice," said Karen Mock, a founder of JSpace, as well as a human rights consultant and former national director of the League of Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

Opposition politicians and activists argue that left-wing NGOs in the country such as Peace Now, the New Israel Fund and Breaking the Silence – a group comprising former Israeli soldiers that documents alleged IDF abuses in the West Bank – would be unfairly isolated by the bill, since almost all that would be affected identify with the political left. These groups often receive funding from European governments or the European Union, while right-wing NGOs in the country are often funded by private donors. The bill would demand disclosure from groups funded by foreign governments, but not those funded by individuals living abroad.

"It looks like they're trying to not be so obviously discriminatory by wording [the bill] so that it appears to apply to all NGOs. But if only one category of NGOs fits that description, then it's systematically biased, and it means they've figured out a loophole to try to cut off some legitimate organizations and lobbyists at the knees," Mock said.

Supporters of the bill say NGOs funded by European governments use human rights as a screen to interfere in internal Israeli matters.

The bill was lauded in an email bulletin sent out by Avi Benlolo, CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center in Toronto.

"Israel's democratic nature has been taken advantage of over many years by numerous internal and external NGOs undermining Israel's security interests," Benlolo said.

Ayelet Shaked

He added: "In no way does [the bill] prevent the activities of those NGOs, nor does it impose any restriction on their activities or forms of expression... [It] will provide a duty of disclosure to anyone working to lobby or influence Israeli parliamentarians on behalf of a foreign entity."

Benlolo did not respond to several attempts by The CJN for further comment.

Issie Lyon, head of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of Peace Now, said the bill would set a "bad precedent."

He argued that a number of pro-settler projects in Israel get significant funding from private Jewish donors in the United States, and the bill would "stigmatize a good proportion of the Israeli population that's working for social justice and conveniently allows funds coming from U.S. evangelical groups and wealthy, right-wing U.S. groups and people like [U.S. casino magnate and philanthropist] Sheldon Adelson to support their groups in Israel without having to wear this badge...

"The government is saying that certain thoughts aren't acceptable and is creating a chill in Israel in terms of what is acceptable discourse around what Israel should do regarding social justice, security and peace."

A spokesperson for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said his group is reluctant to comment on the bill, given that it has not yet passed in the Knesset.

"We're not going to speak about it publicly until we see where the legislation goes. CIJA prefers to take a wait-and-see approach. I know that it's a divisive issue within the community, and we hope that whatever comes out will be more unifying than divisive and consistent with Israeli democracy," he said.

Rex Brynen, a professor of political science at McGill University whose research areas include Middle East politics and security and development in conflict-affected states, said the proposed law is counterproductive for Israeli democracy.

"The legislation seems designed to make it more difficult for human rights groups and others to raise legitimate criticism of current government policy," he said.

"It's also telling that the legislation does not address the very much larger amounts of overseas donations that go to support settler causes, certain media outlets... and even politicians and political parties." ■

Schools vet teachers very carefully, administrators say

sshefa@thecjn.ca

In light of the recent news that former Eitz Chaim Schools teacher Stephen Joseph Schacter was charged with possession of child pornography, Jewish day school administrators in Toronto are assuring parents that they have strict policies in place to protect their students and properly address similar issues that may arise.

Schacter taught at Eitz Chaim between 1986 and 2004, worked as an office administrator and supply teacher at United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy) between 2005 and 2009, and was a private tutor from 2009 until 2011.

Speaking to The CJN about school policies to prevent and address incidents of abuse, administrators at Bialik Hebrew Day School, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and Netivot HaTorah Day School confirmed that all teachers and staff must undergo a criminal background check before they're hired.

"We also thoroughly vet candidates by calling references," said Shana Harris, Bialik's head of school.

Rabbi Jeffrey Rothman, Netivot's head of school, said that "when it comes to new staff, we really do have a rigorous process where we screen them, we check their background formally with multiple references, we do a police check, the vulnerable sector screenings... Our bases are covered."

TanenbaumCHAT head of school Rabbi Lee Buckman said that in addition to requiring a vulnerable sector police check for his staff, the school also has a relationship with police in Toronto and York Region, as well as Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) in the event a situation arises that would require their intervention.

"Anytime something is suspected – whether it is happening in the home or in the classroom – we would immediately contact protective services. Those things are taken very seriously," Rabbi Buckman said.

Rabbi Rothman said teachers at Netivot are trained to be "mandatory reporters."

"To my knowledge there haven't been any accusations here... without a doubt, any accusation would be taken seriously, and there is protocol to report to various administrators... The protocol would be that if the allegations were made and brought to an administrator, then it would be brought to the head of school... and then brought to JF&CS," Rabbi Rothman said.

"Everyone's challenge is finding the fine line. On one hand, you don't want to jump and make the call the first second, and on the other hand, you don't want to take too much time if, God forbid, something is going on. It would be a pretty quick process to figure out that we need to get JF&CS involved."

Rabbi Buckman said that despite a school's best efforts to prevent incidents from happening, it can't always be avoided.

"Even after you do a criminal background check of a new employee, people are people, and 10 years down the line, five years down the line, something bad can happen, and I believe we are not required and it's not feasible to do ongoing criminal background checks. We do it as part of the screening process," he said.

"It can happen in Reform schools, Conservative schools, Orthodox schools, public schools – people are people and they have been in good schools and they have been in bad schools... The most fundamental response is to create an environment at school where students feel they have someone to speak to. Thankfully, our guidance department, deans, principals, and teachers have created that type of environment.

"I think, whether it is with a teacher, a peer or a parent, we have to create an environment where victims feel they have a place to turn, and be heard, and taken seriously and that there is appropriate followup." ■

Last-minute comeback gives Canada Maccabi hoops gold

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Just days after making history as the first Maccabi Canada open men's basketball team to beat the Americans, Canada beat them a second time to win the gold medal in a game Canada's head coach called "the craziest thing ever."

"We started off very slow. We were down about 20 points in the first quarter, but I told our guys, 'Just stay composed and just keep playing our game,'" said head coach Allon Bross, speaking to The CJN just hours after the Jan. 4 win at the Pan American Maccabi Games in Santiago, Chile, which ran from Dec. 26 to Jan. 5.

"We were down by 11 points at halftime. We went into the third quarter and we kept pecking away, and by the end of the third quarter, we were down by seven points," he said. "With 40 seconds to go, we found ourselves down by nine points."

He said that with less than one minute left in the game, the U.S. team was already celebrating their victory on the sidelines.

"And that is when the miracle began to happen," Bross said.

Ave Bross, 22, the coach's son and a Maccabi Games veteran who played four years as a point guard on McGill University's varsity team, put the Americans' premature celebration to a sudden stop.

"[He] hit three three-point shots within 40 seconds, the last one with just two seconds left on the clock to tie the game. That was the craziest thing ever," he said. Canada won 95-85 in overtime.

"They [the Americans] were shocked."

Tali Dubrovsky, Maccabi Canada's national executive director, said the U.S. basketball team traditionally dominates the competition, leaving the Canadians to compete for the silver or bronze, but with a win against the Americans early in the tournament, the Canadian team set its sights on the gold and did not disappoint.

"We had a lot of heroes. Ave was one – he scored 33 points in the game. Sage Usher, our other guard, was off the charts and he scored 27 points. We had our big guys rebound the ball. We had Adam Halpern, who must have had 18 to 20 rebounds, and all these things, all these battles that happened, resulted in us winning. Plus, we had a little bit of mazel. We needed some mazel to get this one," Bross said.

For the team's assistant coach Alex Brainis, this victory was especially sweet.

Brainis was a player on the 1997 Maccabi Canada open men's basketball team that won Canada's first and, until now, only gold medal in basketball, defeating Great Britain.

"And now he has won it as a coach, which will, for our sport in basketball, probably be a very unique statistic," Bross said.

In addition to the basketball team, Maccabi Canada was also represented by a masters tennis team, consisting of 44-year-old Anton Rabie and 40-year-old Lauren Liverman.

Rabie and Liverman each took home a bronze in the singles' tournament and another bronze in the mixed doubles game. ■

Advocate pushes gas station aid for disabled people

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Edward Rice understands the limitations a disability can create, even when you are trying to perform a simple task like filling your car's tank with gasoline.

Rice had polio, but in the past, he was able to drive thanks to special modifications that were made to his minivan. A built-in winch helped get his scooter in and out of the vehicle, and he was able to drive using hand controls.

Gassing up at the neighbourhood self-serve was another matter, he said. It was difficult and time consuming to get out of the car, and even once the winch had lowered him onto his scooter, he'd find himself too far away for the pump hose to reach the tank.

People with other disabilities have different problems. Some find the touch screens too high, the gas caps too difficult to manoeuvre, the nozzles too hard to grasp, and credit cards too hard to handle. And full-service stations are few and far between, even in a city as big as Toronto.

So what to do?

Not a guy to put up his hands in defeat, Rice did some research and found a potential solution south of the border.

> I found gas stations in Florida, and it worked like a charm.

Thanks to an idea called FuelCall developed by Inclusion Solutions, an Illinois-based company, Rice believes there's an off-the-shelf solution to the problem faced by thousands of disabled drivers.

It's fairly simple, though it depends on the co-operation of larger service stations to implement, said Rice, who serves as chair of the Ontarians with disabilities sub-committee of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

All that's required is for the service stations to post prominently lit signage, such as the internationally recognized blue disability sticker on the gas station's logo, visible from the street, indicating there are people on site available for full-service gassing. Once a driver, equipped with the blue disability sign, pulls up to the dedicated gas island, a button is on hand that will summon staff when pushed.

Because it assumes the availability of service staff, the solution is appropriate for larger gas stations, the kinds that also include coffee shops and car washes, Rice said.

Once the button is pushed, staff can tend to the customer, allowing him to proceed with his day without the inconvenience of leaving and re-entering the vehicle or bringing a friend or family member along to help.

The solution can also help promote sales, as the customer can also order snacks, coffee and other merchandise, he added.

"I found gas stations in Florida, and it worked like a charm," said Rice, a retired snowbird.

What's more, the Accessibility for Ontarians with Disabilities Act of 2005 requires businesses that provide goods and services to the public to make these services accessible. Regulations passed under the act specifically refer to service stations.

He noted that in the United States, Marathon, a large chain with hundreds of gas stations, has agreed to implement the FuelCall program.

Late last year, Rice met with David Onley, the former lieutenant-governor of Ontario, who also had polio. Onley now serves as special adviser on accessibility to Brad Duguid, the minister of economic development, employment and infrastructure.

The meeting went well, Rice said, and he's been told that Onley will present the proposed solution to the minister. ■

Summer Science Camp

Join us at SciTech 2016 July 25th - August 18th

The summer camp for the talented students

Curious what scientists really do? Want to see for yourself?

Come work with real scientists in state-of-the-art labs at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology.

Who should be interested

If you are a science-oriented high-school student, in the 11th or 12th grade, with a proven record of academic excellence, then the SciTech International Summer Program may be for you.

The program is intended for all those with a keen interest in science and a commitment to high performance standards. Those who can benefit the most from the Technion's atmosphere of excellence will be selected.

The tuition fee of US$5,400 includes the program tuition, dormitory and cafeteria expenses, a copy of the SciTech 2016 proceedings, a complete health insurance plan, and all excursions during the program. Airfare is not included.

We are grateful that, through the generosity of the Ron and Maria Wolf Fund of the Bernard and Norton Wolf Family Foundation, we are able to offer a limited number of tuition scholarships.

Deadline for registration is February 21, 2016.
The application package can be found on the SciTech website, www.scitech.technion.ac.il

Jewish fertility group welcomes new Ontario funding

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

As of last month, Ontario expanded its in vitro fertilization (IVF) funding to help families struggling financially with infertility, and the executive director of a non-profit that serves infertile Jewish couples said she expects to be a lot busier because of this new development.

"We are thrilled with this new initiative. We think it's great," said Denise Levin executive director of Small Wonders, which helps couples financially, emotionally, medically and halachically.

The province will fund one IVF cycle per eligible patient through an annual $50-million investment. This includes one egg retrieval, which may yield multiple eggs and result in multiple embryos.

Until now, Ontario only provided funding to women with blocked fallopian tubes.

Levin explained that funding one complete round means that "if they retrieve 10 eggs and those 10 eggs turn into 10 embryos and you want to have one of those embryos implanted, you can come back 10 times each time transferring one embryo until you've exhausted them, and the government will cover that complete cycle."

One cycle of IVF costs about $10,000, with drugs and other associated costs adding thousands of dollars more to the cost.

"The cost of medication for IVF can range from $4,000 to $8,000," Levin said.

"What is not funded is the storage of embryos, the pre-genetic screening, egg freezing fee, which is huge – it's $7,000. That is something for a person who wants to save their eggs because they are getting older and they're not in a relationship and don't expect to be pregnant soon."

Levin said some of the "wrinkles" the government still has to work through has to do with how they will address wait lists.

The government has allocated the IVF funding to about 50 clinics throughout the province, she said.

One of the things that's unclear about the waiting lists is what happens to a potential patient who's called by a clinic to undergo treatment, but declines "because I just took a new job and I can't afford to take off six months," Levin said.

"At some clinics, I'd go back to the bottom of the list… What happens to me? Do I have to wait for 200 people ahead of me? Those are wrinkles that need to be worked out. People have extenuating circumstances and can't drop their whole lives to do this," she said.

"Some clinics are using the lottery system… Some are going one by one down the waiting list and some are saying, 'We understand that you have issues, and life happens, so call us back in a few months when you're ready to do this, and in the meantime, we're going to take the next person.' Clinics are making their own rules, and people should be aware when picking a clinic and the clinic should be transparent about how the IVF funding works."

Levin said when it comes to the new government funding, her staff will continue to help Jewish couples grow their families and provide financial support.

"We expect to be busier in 2016. We will still provide additional services in terms of the emotional support, which is a huge component. We still will provide financial support to qualifying Jewish couples, and we will still continue to provide halachic support," Levin said.

"We are going to make sure everybody benefits, especially our couples, although we have no control over getting our couples to the top of any list. We just want to make sure that the people who want free IVF are seeing the right doctors, and we want to help them there."

She said Small Wonders receives daily updates on the new IVF initiative and will provide its clients with the most up-to-date information about how to navigate the often overwhelming world of infertility. ■

Court hears copyright case about Holocaust story

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Judy Maltz

A Federal Court judge is being asked to adjudicate a case that asks, in effect, who owns the story of a Holocaust survivor.

Is it the daughter whose father and other family members were hidden from the Nazis in a Polish farmer's barn and whose story is recounted in a documentary film that she co-directed.

Or is that story, and the facts behind it, now in the public realm and therefore can properly be used as the basis of a novel, with fictionalized elements incorporated into it, without infringing the filmmakers' copyright protection?

Laymen and legal specialists are watching with interest as a Federal Court judge in Ottawa ponders the issue, after an attempt at mediation failed. Four days of court time were set aside, starting Jan. 11, for legal arguments and to consider testimony, which has already been recorded.

The case pits Judy Maltz, whose father, grandfather, aunts and uncle were hidden during the war, versus Jennifer Witterick and Penguin Books Canada. Maltz is suing Witterick for allegedly lifting whole segments from her copyrighted documentary film, No. 4 Street of our Lady. Witterick's book, My Mother's Secret, was published by Penguin Books about four years after the documentary was released. Maltz and her co-directors, Barbara Bird and Richie Sherman, are asking for $6 million in damages.

Witterick told The CJN in 2013 that she was inspired to write the book after viewing the film at Congregation Habonim during Holocaust Education Week in 2011.

"I've done nothing wrong and will be defending this case," said Witterick, founder and CEO of Sky Investment Counsel, a Toronto investment firm.

"All the characters in the book are fictional, because I created them," she added when first contacted by The CJN about the case in March 2014.

The filmmakers, however, say the book lifts entire passages from their 2009 film.

"With the exception of certain limited fictional aspects… the plot of the book is almost identical to that of the [film]," allege documents filed in court.

"The book tells the story of a Polish-Catholic mother and daughter, Franciszka and Helena Halamajowa, who save several Jewish families during the Holocaust, along with a German soldier who defects from the army. Some of the Jews are hidden in the pigsty above her hayloft and others in a hole dug under the kitchen floor. The Halamajowa house is located on Street of Our Lady in the small town of Sokal on the Bug River in Poland.

"The book tells a story that is almost identical to that told in the [film], and in a way that is substantially similar to and a colourable imitation of the [film]. Although some of the names of the characters and places have been changed, the names of the main protagonists and places are the same," Maltz's court documents allege.

They go on to say that hers is the authentic version of the story and that without the film, "the book would not exist."

"The alteration of the [film] by adding fictionalized and sensationalized aspects does not change the fact that the book is substantially similar to and a colourable imitation of the [film]. Other than distorting the [film] and causing significant elements of the public to become aware of a fictionalized and sensationalized version of the [film], the book contains very little original expression of its own," the documents allege.

"Amongst those saved by Halamajowa were Maltz's grandparents and father, two aunts and an uncle. Prior to the release of the [film], this story was virtually unknown, recorded only in the posthumously published diary of the late Moshe Maltz, who was one of those rescued by Halamajowa."

The case attracted the attention of The 1709 Blog, about copyright issues. It said it raises the thorny issue of a fictional work based on historical facts, especially when the facts can be found in only one other source. Another British blog, The Drum, notes "the lawsuit raises the interesting question about when authors can take historical events, fictionalize them and create a new piece of work from an existing, yet factual event."

In March 2014, Witterick explained why she was motivated to write the book. As a Taiwanese-Chinese immigrant, she could "never understand why people didn't like Jewish people. I've always been really interested in the Holocaust. I myself am a child of immigrants and I understand what it's like to be on the outside and being and underdog. So this kind of Holocaust story really resonates with me."

Witterick said she donated her book advance to charity. "My objective was never to make money on this book. My objective was to write a book to help young people understand what happened in the Holocaust." ■

New direction for U of T's Journal of Jewish Thought

To most, the distinction between Jewish thought and Jewish studies likely appears slight.

To Josh Tapper, a Toronto journalist and graduate student at the University of Toronto's Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies (CJS), shifting the focus of U of T's Journal of Jewish Thought from the former to the latter constitutes a whole new direction for the publication.

Last spring, Tapper took over as executive editor of the journal, an online peer-reviewed scholarly periodical that CJS graduate students have produced annually since 2011, except for a hiatus in 2014.

Tapper stressed that despite the journal retaining – for now – its original name, he and associate editors Liza Futerman, a PhD student in comparative literature, and Alexis Lerner, a PhD student in political science, have been working toward a total rebrand, reflected in the 2015 issue, released Dec. 8.

"Jewish thought to me is… the philosophy of Jewish thinking or the study of Jewish religious texts… Jewish studies takes us beyond that… There are historians, literary scholars, Yiddishists, political scientists, anthropologists, ethnographers – people in all sorts of disciplines – who can call themselves scholars of Jewish studies," explained Tapper, whose graduate research looks at post-Soviet Jewish life and culture.

The journal will continue to provide a forum for CJS students and faculty, as well as for international scholars, to publish research, reviews, political and literary criticism and short fiction or poetry, but Tapper said it will focus less on philosophy and theology and be more interdisciplinary in scope.

"I saw an opportunity to tweak things and incorporate some of my own interests and those of people I work with… the past issues were lively, but I [wanted] to make this a… more inclusive journal of Jewish studies," he said.

The new issue's theme is "boundaries." It includes a conversation with Daniel Boyarin, a professor of talmudic culture at the University of California, who delivered the Pearl and Jack Mandel Lecture in Jewish Studies at U of T; a piece by Jason M. Schlude, an assistant professor of classics at the College of Saint Benedict and Saint John's University in Minnesota, which examines Herod the Great's crossing of personal, religious and political borders; a piece by U of T doctoral student and associate editor Alexis Lerner about Russian anti-Semitism in the era of President Vladimir Putin; and a piece by Noam Lemish, a pianist, composer and doctoral candidate in jazz performance at U of T, who fused an unrecorded Soviet Yiddish song from the 1940s with another Soviet song – the article includes reflections on his process, musical notations and an MP3 sample of the music.

"To have the piece on Herod at one end and the piece on Russian anti-Semitism on the other speaks to the breadth of possibility when it comes to content for this journal, showing that Jewish studies can trace from the Second Temple period all the way to 2015," Tapper said.

He said the versatility of the articles and the innovative presentation of works like Lemish's speak to the new editorial mandate as being more accessible – a growing trend in academic scholarship. "I want this to push the boundaries of digital scholarship… to find a middle ground between scholarship that's rooted in tradition… but also something that people who aren't scholars can read and appreciate."

Part of this push will involve revamping the website, something he hopes to do in the new year, and using social media to promote individual articles to a wider readership.

Tapper's journalistic background – he was a reporter at the Toronto Star and has written for publications such as the New York Times, Washington Post and the Forward – has likely played a role in his re-imagining of the journal, but he stressed, "I'm not trying to make this more journalistic or dumb it down, but I want it to be accessible."

Anna Shternshis, acting director of CJS and an associate professor in Yiddish studies, said the journal provides an opportunity for students to present their work in less traditional, but no less rigorous, ways, and that the new direction allows for content to reach across diverse areas of Jewish studies.

"The beauty of this is it's a project that's fully run by graduate students. So they get to choose what's interesting, what disciplines should speak to each other and the format," Shternshis said.

"It's very rare for a centre of Jewish studies at a major university to provide such a forum for grad students to get their publications out, and in a way that's really not stuffy, that's interesting and speaks to academics and non-academics." ■

Engineer pays tribute to teacher who saved him

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Russian-born Vladimir Rott said that if not for his elementary school physics teacher, he might have never made the transition from a street kid with no academic ambition to a prize-winning engineer and author.

And last month, Rott and his wife, Iya, travelled back to his former home of Belarus to celebrate the 100th birthday of Nokolay Nikolayvich Vdovin, a man Rott calls a "miracle of HaShem."

Speaking in his Forest Hill home, Rott, 80, a Russian-born Jew of Hungarian descent told The CJN about his hard childhood and the man who took him under his wing.

"I was a street boy. I didn't have a father. My father was arrested, he was in prison," Rott said.

His father, an expert in the lumber mill industry, moved to Belarus to develop the local mill. His mother was a "madame" who spoke German, "because they were Hungarian elite," Rott said in his heavily accented Russian drawl.

Rott was three years old when Stalin arrested his father and sent him to a Siberian gulag, from which he never returned.

"We were thrown in the street. [My mother] had no language. We didn't have nothing, and we became enemies of the state."

His mother was forced to do manual labour to support her family. "We were so poor," he said.

During the war, his family hid their Jewishness and identified as Hungarian.

"My mother was working hard and I wasn't going to school. Two years in Grade 5. All of a sudden, a Russian officer who was injured in Hungary came. After spending a year in a Hungarian hospital, he returned to Bobruysk [now Belarus]," Rott recalled.

"He came to my mother in the street… told her to go back to Hungary where she would have a better life. She said, 'But my husband is in prison and I don't know when he's coming.' This was 1949. I was 13."

She told Vdovin she no longer had Hungarian citizenship, and working hard in Russia wasn't an issue for her.

"She said, 'My main problem is Vladimir. Last night he wasn't home… he doesn't go to school.'"

Rott said when he went to school the next September, Vdovin, who'd been hired as a new physics teacher, brought him to his class and made him class leader.

"I was so upset, because now I couldn't miss school, because every day I had to go and report who wasn't there today."

Rott said Vdovin, although a bit odd, was an excellent teacher.

"He had a brain injury in the war, and he was a little bit coo-coo, but he was good for us," Rott said.

"He was very fair and he was not afraid to say, 'Good for you.' Because nobody said nothing like that to me. He was able to encourage me."

Vdovin was Rott's physics teacher until he graduated after Grade 10. Rott went to university, obtained an engineering degree, got married to his wife and lived in Bobruysk where they had three children.

He was in charge of installing machinery for a Lada car plant that employed 170,000 workers and produced three cars per minute.

Despite his success, in 1974, he left for Canada, looking for a better life outside the USSR, and as with most students and teachers, he lost touch with Vdovin.

About 30 years later, in 2004, Rott planned a family trip to Russia to show his children and grandchildren where and how he grew up.

Having kept in touch with one of his classmates in Belarus, Rott learned Vdovin was still alive and in a nursing home with his wife. Rott decided to visit him, and they spent a day together, reuniting for the first time in 50 years.

Last year, Rott checked in on his then 99-year-old former physics teacher to ask if he could visit him for his 100th birthday. At first, Vdovin tried to talk him out of it, worried that he and his wife were too frail to accommodate him.

"I said, 'What do I need from you? I just want to hug you. And you will sit between us like a general in a wedding.'"

On Dec. 21, Rott and his wife went to the nursing home to celebrate Vdovin's 100th birthday, along with Vdovin's wife, two daughters, and granddaughters.

Reflecting on Vdovin's role in his life, Rott said, "God brought him to me. In all my books, I always write about miracles. This was one of the miracles… It was a miracle of HaShem that I met him." ■

Considering Conversion?

Jewish Learning: Jewish Living

Genuine Choice, Genuine Commitment

A multi-denominational course, ideal for those exploring the possibility of conversion to Judaism

Each person's journey towards Judaism is organic and individual. We invite you to explore Judaism and your growing relationship with it through the lenses of different Jewish denominations. This course introduces the central Jewish ideas and practices, texts and experiences that form the foundation of a Jewish life.

If you decide to pursue conversion, this course will give you the tools to choose an informed, healthy and whole commitment to Jewish living and the Jewish people.

This year-long, biweekly course is solely an educational endeavour. Enrolling does not guarantee conversion. An individual who chooses to pursue conversion will choose a mentor and will continue the process based on specific denominational requirements.

Group helps grandparents alienated from grandkids

SHUTTERSTOCK PHOTO

"Unbearable" is the word Rivka Zelin uses to describe the pain of not being allowed to see one's grandchildren.

Rivka Zelin is the alias the 61-year-old Toronto resident uses to protect her family's identity in her role as leader of the group Alienated Grandparents Anonymous (AGA) Toronto, which had its first meeting last June.

AGA Toronto is a support group for grandparents who are estranged from their grandchildren, usually because of the demands of their adult children.

It's an offshoot of a group that was founded in Florida about four years ago and has since expanded to more than 40 U.S. states, as well as, last September, to Ottawa.

Zelin's own son disengaged from his family and friends after he got married and doesn't allow Zelin to spend time with his children. She saw the Ottawa chapter of AGA advertised in a newspaper there and, after speaking with the organizer, decided to start a group in Toronto.

The latter convenes twice a month at North York Civic Centre and provides a non-judgmental space where individuals can share their stories among those undergoing similar struggles, to draw comfort from, "see[ing] their own family's story happening in other families," Zelin said.

She explained that this sort of alienation typically involves an individual who bars his or her own parents from seeing their grandkids and doing things that grandparents "crave," Zelin said, such as cooking for their grandchildren, babysitting them or taking them to see a show.

This can happen for a variety of reasons, Zelin said, but it's often because the adult child has a personality disorder or mental health issue that causes them to cut themselves off from their parents, or the adult child has a partner who, due to a personality disorder or mental health issue, is extremely controlling and insists they sever ties with their parents.

She also cited instances where an adult child passes away and their spouse severs contact with the dead partner's mother and father, or where there is a "high-conflict divorce" and one grandparent is pushed away and prevented from seeing his or her grandkids.

The alienation can happen at various levels, she noted, with some grandparents having zero contact with grandchildren; some being permitted to see their grandchildren occasionally; some not knowing why they've been cut off; and others only knowing vague details about their grandchildren.

In many situations, a sort of brainwashing effect can happen, Zelin said, in which a spouse or children are fed lies about a grandparent or grandparents.

AGA Toronto functions as a free drop-in and has a core group of 10 to 15 regular members, roughly half of whom attend with their spouse.

The majority of members are Jewish like Zelin, but she emphasized that there is no specific Jewish focus and that everyone is welcome.

Of the group, she said, "we don't just sit with the pain... we seek to understand the concept of alienation, how it happens and what makes the pain of it so strong... We invite experts like lawyers, social workers or psychologists to come talk to us about what we can and can't do, and strategize ways to remain strong and happy... The idea is that if our grandchildren do one day come around, we want to be strong and happy people that open the door to them," she said.

The members also discuss the stages of grief that alienation can trigger and ways to transition from anger to acceptance.

"With anger, we may make the situation worse... So we learn how to remain serene and respond peacefully to difficult situations," Zelin said.

The group also helps to lessen the sense of stigma or shame surrounding the alienation, Zelin said, explaining that people often assume a grandparent has been cut off because he or she did something wrong to the child or grandchild.

She stressed that none of the AGA members are in this situation, but the fear of being judged harshly often prevents people from discussing the issue with others.

The group is important, Zelin said, because it both gives those suffering a sense of belonging and support, and because its existence lets society know that grandparent alienation is a phenomenon that's "very much alive." ■

Those interested in AGA Toronto can email Zelin at aga.toronto75@gmail.com or call 905 -771 7610.

Subway operator sings while she works

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jessie Kushner

The next time you board the Yonge-University or Sheppard subway lines, there's a good chance Jessie Kushner will be in control.

The spunky 26-year-old is among a handful of women who's a driver (they prefer the term "operator") of a Toronto Transit Commission subway train.

It's not a traditional job for a young Jewish woman from Toronto, but Kushner wouldn't have it any other way.

"It wasn't like I dreamed of doing it growing up," she told The CJN in an interview.

But, she added, "this is actually a really good job in today's age. It pays well and benefits are good."

A subway operator since last summer, Kushner came to the job via a more conventional route.

She graduated from Dalhousie University with a degree in business management, followed that up with study in financial planning and earned a Canadian securities license.

She worked at a downtown bank branch for a few years as an adviser/teller.

"I wasn't making very good money and I was working a lot of hours," she recalled. Plus, "it was extremely stressful. I didn't feel it was worth it."

She applied for dozens of jobs and put in for one at the TTC two years ago "because I took the system every day and I knew what it was like to be on the subway, being crammed inside. I get it. I thought, 'I'd rather be driving the subway than going to my office every day.' "

Besides, the TTC paid better.

She found the 34 days of training "extremely hard." The training for a subway train, she explains, is much more rigorous than for a bus or streetcar.

"I didn't know that I would even make it through training, it was so challenging. But now that I'm actually driving the subway, it is super easy for me. I have it down."

The hardest part, she said, are odd hours that dent her personal life. Being underground for long periods makes her tired.

Kushner knows of one other Jewish woman who drives a subway train, and on the day The CJN interviewed her at the TTC's Wilson Yard, two other employees were conversing in Hebrew.

The daughter of Leon and Dorothy Kushner of Toronto, she "definitely" gets reactions when she tells people what she does.

"They want to ask me dozens of questions."

Chief among them is whether anyone has committed suicide by jumping in front of her train.

Happily, that hasn't happened on her watch but she's trained to be on the lookout for people who might jump or fall onto the tracks.

The trains are about 450 feet long and "don't stop like a car," Kushner explained. "When it comes right down to it, there's nothing you can do about it. I don't think anyone can really train you for how you react in that situation."

Neither has she encountered sick or violent passengers.

"I don't want any guns or knives on my train," Kushner said emphatically. "I know that's going to happen sooner or later."

People also tend to believe that the subway is fully automated.

"It's not automated," said Kushner, who took time to show a CJN reporter the surprisingly simple controls of her train. "It's all human. Someone's driving it and opening and closing the doors."

A driver must consider the train's speed, myriad signals that do not resemble those above ground, and look out the window to ensure that passengers board and exit safely.

"If something does go wrong, like someone pulling the passenger alarm and there are over 1,000 people crammed onto the train, that's a stressful situation."

For the most part, though, the job has been pretty unpressured. She's encountered a few passenger alarms "but nothing that put me over the edge."

As for those invariable rush hour delays, "I totally understand. But it's certainly not the operator's fault when there's a problem. I have to say we deal with them pretty quickly."

The job "is what you make of it," Kushner said. "Sometimes, when I'm driving, I sing to myself. I'm having a good time." ■

Winnipeg CJA campaign ahead of last year's pace

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

This community's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign organizers and volunteers are all smiles after a down year last year.

For 16 years in a row, the Winnipeg campaign had annually reached or exceeded ever-higher fundraising targets. The 2014-2015 campaign ended the streak, but this year's campaign has once again been full steam ahead.

"To this point [as of Jan. 5], we have raised $5,646,537," said Elaine Goldstine, longtime CJA campaign director and newly appointed CEO of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. "We are up over $200,000 from where we were at the same time last year. We are also up 6.1 per cent card for card and have enlisted 181 new donors."

The 2013-2014 campaign raised $5.8 million, an increase of about $150,000 over the year before. The goal for last year was $5,950,000. The final tally, however, was $5,647,806 – more than $300,000 short of the goal and almost $150,000 less than the year before.

Goldstine attributed the shortfall in part in large part to the loss of several major donors who died.

"We are hopeful that last year was just a blip in our upward trend," she said. "This year, our target is $5.8 million and, at the present rate, we should surpass that figure. [The campaign officially closes at the end of March.] We are cautiously optimistic. We are keeping our fingers crossed."

She attributes the rosier outlook this year to a number of factors, including many more telethons and much more help in fundraising from CJA beneficiary agencies, who saw their allocations from the federation cut last year because of the campaign shortfall.

"Our beneficiary agencies really stepped up this year in helping with our canvassing," she said.

The 2015-16 campaign was chaired by lawyer Bryan Klein, a longtime CJA canvasser, while the women's philanthropy campaign chair was Elana Schultz who, Goldstine said, has been a CJA canvasser since she was a teenager and has been very much involved in the women's campaign for the last few years. Both will be back for a second year.

"Bryan, Elana and their team of canvassers did a great job," Goldstine said. "They reached out to a lot of people. The personal phone calls and frequent meetings made a difference."

As well as funds raised from the campaign, Goldstine said last fall's Words and Deeds Leadership Awards dinner in honour of the Asper family and the Asper Foundation was attended by 850 people and raised $450,000. Half of the total went to the community's endowment fund, with the remainder going to the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs – the dinner's co-sponsor – for a project of the Asper family's choosing.

"Our 'Leave More Than Memories' endowment fund is at $3.7 million," she added. "We are working closely with the Jewish Foundation to develop short- and long-term strategies to increase the endowment."

Goldstine said that about 20 per cent of the funds raised by CJA are earmarked for overseas initiatives such as Birthright Israel trips, March of the Living, Israel advocacy and support for programs in Israel and countries of the former Soviet Union. The campaign itself and the federation account for nine per cent each of funds raised, with the remainder designated for local beneficiary agencies.

"We have a very generous community," she said.

She said one of the first orders of business in the new year will be finding a new CJA campaign director. Goldstine had been the director for the past 11 years.

"I have been juggling both jobs [campaign director and federation CEO] for the past seven months," she said. "It has been challenging." ■

Chassidim vow court action if rezoning goes ahead

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Members of the chassidic community sent a mise en demeure, a legal demand letter, to Outremont councillors on Jan. 5 in an attempt to forestall the Montreal borough from proceeding with its plan to prohibit new places of worship in certain commercial districts.

The plaintiffs' lawyer, Julius Grey, says the proposed rezoning of the areas around Laurier and Bernard avenues will adversely affect the growing chassidic community by preventing it from opening needed additional synagogues. The council's proposal that places of worship be restricted in future to a zone in the northeast corner of the borough, near the train tracks, is not acceptable, because it is a 20- to 30-minute walk from where most Chassidim live, Grey said.

The letter warns that if the council goes ahead, the plaintiffs will contest the matter in court.

Outremont is expected to issue a public notice Jan. 14 on procedure now that the council has voted twice in favour of the proposed bylaw, at its November and December meetings.

In accordance with Quebec law, the proposed rezoning will be put to a referendum if a minimum number (to be announced) of Outremont residents sign a register indicating their opposition to the bylaw. If there are insufficient signatures, the council will vote for a third and final time on the proposed bylaw.

The vote tally was 4-1 at the two previous council meetings, with the only dissenter being Coun. Mindy Pollak, a member of the chassidic community.

Just before the second vote on Dec. 7, Grey sent a letter on behalf of members of the chassidic community to borough Mayor Marie Cinq-Mars expressing their objection to the changes.

"It is clear that the regulation directly targets [the Chassidim] not with the goal of satisfying their needs, but of bullying them. Moreover, Outremont has an unfortunate history and strained relations with this community," he wrote.

Grey, who specializes in civil rights, notes that at the public consultation meeting the borough convened on Dec. 1, the majority of the presenters spoke against the rezoning, and, therefore, the bylaw, if adopted as is, could be declared invalid. Most of the opponents were chassidic.

The local newspaper L'Express d'Outremont reported Jan. 5 that a petition in favour of the rezoning has collected nearly 900 signatures.

Julius Grey

Mayer Feig, who frequently speaks on behalf of the Chassidim, said the community is ready to mobilize its members for a register.

Jews are estimated to represent about 20 per cent of Outremont's population.

Feig maintains the council is acquiescing to a small group of residents who "do not like us" and who perennially accuse the Chassidim of flouting bylaws and otherwise not being good citizens.

He also says there is no solid evidence that banning more places of worship would revitalize Laurier and Bernard, which the council says is the intention. No independent study has been conducted to support that claim, Feig said.

Before the rezoning was proposed, a chassidic congregation had applied to the borough to open a religious centre, which would house a mikvah, on Bernard Avenue.

Michael Rosenberg, a prominent real estate developer and one of the plaintiffs, said a few weeks ago he convened a meeting of Bernard merchants. Some raised concerns about more religious establishments, but Rosenberg thinks that "most of them well understood that... such places of worship... do not constitute a threat to the local economy.

"What is certain, all acknowledge that other measures should be undertaken to improve the present commercial situation."

Rosenberg is skeptical about the council's defence that it's not singling out the chassidic community, as the bylaw would apply to all religions.

"There is no doubt that the measures envisioned directly target... almost exclusively the Jewish community... and undoubtedly strike at its fundamental rights, all for the claimed goal of promoting local commerce, without demonstrating the existence of any harmful impact." ■

JAIL FOR 'CONTROLLING' YOUR SPOUSE AND VERBAL ABUSE

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator

The Globe and Mail reports that "people who use repeated threats, humiliation and intimidation to control their intimate partners or family members could face prosecution in England and Wales under a law which became effective on December 29 2015". "Coercive or controlling" behaviour can now be prosecuted as a crime punishable by a fine and up to five years in prison. It can be applied only when the behaviour has had a "serious effect" on the victim's life or causes them to fear violence if they don't comply.

One of the examples the British police authorities gave is telling your spouse that she is "worthless." Prison terms for repeated name-calling as opposed to physical abuse takes the law beyond a firm legal boundary. Needless to say such verbal abuse has always been sufficient to end a marriage without invoking criminal sanction. Britain's Parliament decided to make it a criminal offence when such conduct becomes so repetitive and ongoing as to cause major and demonstrable emotional problems for the victim.

In Ontario where zero tolerance rules, Police are required to arrest an alleged offender in a domestic dispute once a complaint is made, but only when violence or a threat of violence is cited. One has to wonder how the new British law would actually work if enacted in Ontario. "Officer, he keeps telling me what to do 'cause he won't let me go to back to school. I'm stuck here taking care of the kids. About two years ago he kept telling me I was worthless. Arrest him." Now remember, in Britain the complainant only has to cite a "serious effect" on her life: there does not have to be any allegation of violence or a threat of violence. Today, a police officer would normally treat such complaints as a family law matter and refer this lady to the family courts. He/she might also suggest the complainant seek advice from a matrimonial lawyer. The lawyer might suggest (a) marriage counseling (b) mediation (c) alternatively, a court application for custody, child and spousal support (d) equalization of property. Secondly, if she truly feared *a threat of violence then what most readers don't know is that this threat is what is legally known as "assault." If necessary, her spouse could be arrested and charged with assault for that reason immediately. Most confuse the concept of "assault" with "battery" Battery is the actual violence itself, not the threat of violence.

No one should ever compromise themselves in a relationship fraught with intimidation, bullying, and the fear of consequences. We all live on borrowed time and life is too short. However, if a victim requires the law to assist then both the criminal and family law should be applied like a surgical tool, not a blunt instrument to help such spouses successfully. Otherwise I fear we may be asking too much of our wonderful Police officers.

Radio-Canada defends Mideast correspondent

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Luc Chartrand

Radio-Canada has defended one of its Middle East correspondents against charges by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) that his reporting is biased against Israel.

Ombudsman Pierre Tourangeau absolved Luc Chartrand from CIJA's accusation that he breached the network's stated journalistic norms with his "one-sided" coverage and has a history of allowing his alleged sympathy for the Palestinians to influence his reports.

CIJA says it is disappointed with the review by Tourangeau, who previously upheld some of its complaints about the public broadcaster's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and questions the independence of the ombudsman's office.

In the complaint, David Ouellette, CIJA's associate director of public affairs for Quebec, focused on Chartrand's piece, "Guerre morale ou crime de guerre?" (Moral war or war crime?), which aired Oct. 29 on the weekly TV newsmagazine Enquête.

"This report is emblematic of all that is wrong with Radio-Canada coverage of the Israeli-Palestininian conflict," Ouellette said.

He argued that Chartrand's examination of civilian deaths in the conflict between Hamas and Israel in Gaza in 2014 was unbalanced. In a point-by-point analysis, he said Chartrand paid scant attention to Israeli civilians targeted by Hamas and other militant Palestinian groups, leaving "the false impression that Israel was essentially conducting a war against defenceless civilians."

Ouellette suggested Chartrand was selective in his citing of data from the report of the UN Human Rights Council and gave too much weight to interviewees sympathetic to the Palestinians or self-critical Israelis, such as the dissident ex-soldiers' group Breaking the Silence.

Tourangeau not only clears Chartrand of wrongdoing in a 10,000-word report headed Israel: une diversité de vues que ne traduit pas le discours officiel (Israel: A Diversity of Views that the Official Line does not Convey), issued Dec. 18. He also scolds pro-Israel advocates for going too far and highlights the difficulties foreign journalists have covering the Middle East.

He upheld Enquête's right to look solely into the Israeli military's actions during the conflict for this feature, but cites a number of instances where Chartrand sought input from the Israeli side, including making clear that Israel was reacting to rocket fire on its residential areas from Gaza.

Tourangeau comments that the close media scrutiny Israel faces is the price of democracy. It respects freedoms that its adversaries have the advantage of being able to disregard.

CIJA turned to the ombudsman after Radio-Canada news director Jean Pelletier, editor-in-chief of Enquête, disagreed with its objections to Chartrand's reporting.

Ouellette also argued that a novel Chartrand published last year, L'Affaire Myosotis, is evidence of what Chartrand really thinks about Israel and its "lobby" in Canada. This thriller revolves around a former Quebec journalist living in Israel who gets mixed up in the murder of a man associated with a Canadian agency promoting democracy. It turns out a Canadian pro-Israel organization is behind the death, an attempt to stymie an investigation into an alleged Israeli war crime.

Ouellette said Chartrand, who has said the book is based on his own research, "blurs the line between fact and fiction."

While Tourangeau and Pelletier dismissed the relevance of a work of fiction to the matter, Ouellette told The CJN that the fact Radio-Canada assigned a journalist who has written such a book to investigate alleged Israeli war crimes is troubling.

Ouellette said the Radio-Canada response to this file reflects negatively on its "credibility" and "shows there are limits to the independence of the ombudsman," after Tourangeau had "sent signals he took our complaints seriously."

Chartrand, a veteran journalist, joined Radio-Canada in 2000, and has worked in Afghanistan and Iraq. According to the network's website, he won the Prix Judith-Jasmin in 2010 for a report on the "pro-Israel lobby in Canada."

In an email to The CJN and others in the Jewish community, Chartrand called the matter a "very sad misstep" ("un bien triste dérapage)" and expressed a sense of vindication. "The pressures of the plaintiff and the organization he represents on media coverage are part of the scene for a long time. Never, however, has it gone this far… 'prosecution for one's opinions' – to use the term in the response of Radio-Canada's management – and 'guilt by association,' the ombudsman's term.

"I am personally saddened to see the debate brought down to this level." ■

Jewish vote could be up for grabs in the future

Other Jews did, too, he surmised. Although there is no data yet to show how Jews voted in Mount Royal in 2015, in earlier elections, Irwin Cotler would take the riding with 92 per cent of the vote. Housefather got only about 40 per cent, suggesting that Jews, like the rest of the population, have switched allegiances from where they were before, he said.

Shapiro believes the Jewish vote, particularly among young people, will be up for grabs in future elections. It will depend on particular issues, candidates and party leaders.

"My kids are all over the place," he said. "I don't think the young generation is locked into anything. I think it's, 'What are you going to do for me now?'" he said.

Torontonian Chani Aryeh-Bain says she's always been a Conservative. "I like their sound economic policies. That was the main attraction.

"When Harper came into office, I definitely liked his policies on the Middle East," she added.

Aryeh-Bain, who ran a business for 25 years, said "I liked the job [Oliver] did as finance minister. He's quiet, calm and steady. That's what I liked about him."

During the recent federal election campaign, Aryeh-Bain worked for Oliver and tried to recruit other supporters.

"I mobilized Jewish women in our riding," she said. "That's a segment that generally doesn't go out to vote."

She managed to persuade 100 Jewish women to volunteer on Oliver's campaign.

Although Aryeh-Bain said it's tough to recruit people in large numbers to work on a campaign, she believes Jewish support for the Liberals has waned somewhat, unlike support for the Tories.

"The Liberals have changed and Jews have drifted away from them," she said.

Under Harper, the government steered a moral course on the Middle East, even if it wasn't always popular, and she expects that to continue, regardless of who becomes the party's next leader.

As for Trudeau, she wishes him well. "If he fails, we all fail," she said. But she finds him too celebrity-oriented, too much flash compared to Harper's low-key reliability. As for his support for Israel, "I'm not convinced of it, but let's wait and see," she said.

In the meantime, she's not just waiting for the next election in four years. She's already arranged a get-together of dozens of women, the majority from the Orthodox community, to answer their questions about "what to do now."

"We'll discuss how to [stay] interested in politics and how to take on an active role," she said. "I want to see where their strengths lie and what they want to do."

> I don't think the young generation is locked into anything.

"Like many Jews, I voted Liberal ever since I could vote. I was very skeptical about Preston Manning and the conservatives from the West and I associated Stephen Harper with that movement," he said. But with Harper as the leader, he was persuaded to vote Tory, "for the first time in my life."

A Toronto immigration lawyer, Mamann said he has opposed Conservative policy on some issues related to his field, but backed them on others. He's done the same with the Liberals.

But, he continued, "it's not good to be a one-issue voter.

"I'm not a 'big C' Conservative or a 'big L' Liberal," he said. "If somebody has a good plan for the country, I'm going to follow him regardless of the party."

"I felt very comfortable with [Harper's] hand on the wheel of the economy," he said. In fact, that was what initially attracted him to the party. "It was only after the first [minority] term that I saw him as a defender of Israel and of a principled foreign policy, one that was not necessarily popular but was consistent with our Canadian values," he said.

Mamann believes those positions were based on principles, not crude electoral calculations. "Even if you don't look at it from that position, the statements on the Middle East conflict must have cost him many more votes than it brought in," he said.

Mamann said Conservative policies are important to him. He likes the conservative agenda of low taxes, fiscal prudence and less red tape. He wants to see the economy remain vibrant and believes the Liberals will introduce expensive programs that "we don't need" and are "ill-conceived," which will require higher tax burdens into the future. "Kids will be paying for the luxuries their parents enjoyed," he said.

Mamann said he was a big supporter of Pierre Trudeau and admired the changes to the constitution he spearheaded.

As for the current prime minister, Pierre's son, "I don't have confidence that he's capable of running the country."

Ryerson professor loved literacy, Yiddish and family

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Born in Radom, Poland, in 1939, Adam Gabriel Fuerstenberg survived the war as a child by escaping with his mother to Galicia, then to Soviet Asia, while most of their extended family were murdered by the Nazis. Residing in a displaced persons camp in Stuttgart, Germany, after the war, the small, malnourished child used to demonstrate his love of reading by walking across town to a small lending library in the American zone.

"One day, Eleanor Roosevelt came to look at the American library, and the librarian trotted out this solitary little guy – Adam – to show her how the library was being used by the local children," said Gloria Fuerstenberg of her late husband, who died in Toronto on Jan. 3, at age 76.

Fuerstenberg, who knew four or five languages, including being fluent in Yiddish, went on to become an esteemed professor of English literature at Ryerson University. A passionate teacher, he was the founder of the 27-year-old Canadian Jewish Book Awards and a long-serving editor of Parchment, the journal of Canadian Jewish literature.

> He was my colossus. He was my comrade in arms, always ready to defend and protect.

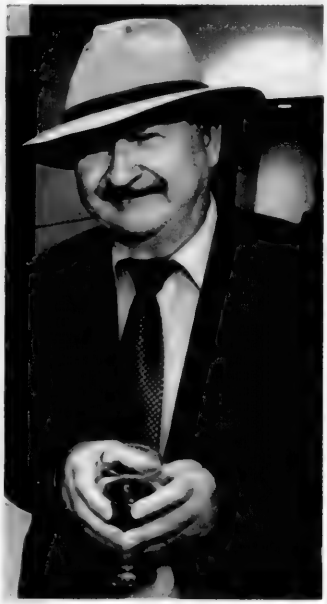
Books and literature were as central in his life as the many students, writers, teachers and others whom he encouraged and inspired.

"He was a person who understood darkness, and was an expert in every detail of the darkness of the Holocaust," Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky said in a eulogy. "And yet he brought a tremendous amount of light into the world."

"He was my colossus," said his younger sister, Anna, who was born in the displaced persons camp in Stuttgart. "He was my comrade in arms, always ready to defend and protect. We were, in his words, the 'last of the Mohicans.'"



Adam Fuerstenberg

Arriving with his parents in Montreal in 1951, Fuerstenberg went to fabled Baron Byng High School while his father worked as a carpenter. When his father put some money from his first paycheque down on an encyclopedia, the barely teenaged Fuerstenberg started reading the multi-volumed set all the way through from front to back.

He went to Sir George Williams University (now Concordia) and then studied English literature as a graduate student at the State University of New York in Buffalo. Soon after he married the former Gloria Lidsky in Montreal in 1964, the couple moved to Toronto.

One day, on a whim, Fuerstenberg dropped by the English department of Ryerson Polytechnic Institute, as it was then known, and asked for a job. He was hired, and he remained on faculty for 41 years, also becoming a long-serving member of the Ryerson board of governors.

For a while, Fuerstenberg headed the community's committee for Yiddish and was the first literary critic to write appreciations of Canadian Yiddish writers.

"He was the pioneer scholar who wrote about Canadian-Jewish writing, both Yiddish and English," said his friend, Seymour Mayne, a professor of English at the University of Ottawa. "He was the first to take it seriously, and many others followed."

Fuerstenberg headed the Holocaust Education Centre in Toronto for a time and helped to bring important exhibits to Toronto, including one on Anne Frank. Several years ago, he escorted a group of teachers on an educational Holocaust trip to Europe. He was an enthusiastic champion of numerous projects, including a Toronto Jewish museum project about a decade ago.

"He felt passionately that there should be a Jewish museum" in Toronto's former ROM Planetarium, said his son, Zack. "He was probably in the early iterations of proposing the idea, but I believe the project is now in the process of being realized. Other people have obviously taken it forward."

A widely published scholar, Fuerstenberg wrote occasional pieces in The Canadian Jewish News, the National Post and the New York (English) Forward, including a story two years ago on the "significant Jewish backstory" to the popular television series, Downton Abbey. He also wrote an appreciation on Jewish writing in Canada for the website Historica Canada.

"He was the first to break ground connecting Yiddish literary culture in Canada to the work and writing life of the first generation of Jewish Canadian English-language writers, including A.M. Klein, Irving Layton and Mordecai Richler," asserted the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies, which awarded him its Louis Rosenberg Distinguished Service Award in 2014. "One need only check any bibliography of Jewish and Yiddish Canadian writing to note his trailblazing distinguished contributions."

"Boundless optimism, commitment to teaching, and utter devotion to family" were the three qualities that best defined his father, according to son Zack. Others cite his many enthusiasms and his eagerness to help others after having known suffering and deprivation in his early life.

"Adam gave the same level of respect to the person who washed the floors and to the person who was chairman of the university," Gloria said. "He was truly a democrat in his heart."

In addition to his wife, Gloria, and sister, Anna, he leaves children Glenda, Zack and Ariela and their spouses, and three grandchildren. ■

Shooter's killing raises questions for police and Israeli Arabs

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

The killing of Nashat Milhem on Jan. 10, a week after he shot dead three people in Tel Aviv, won't be remembered as much of a success for the security establishment.

On the tactical level, more than a few problems came to light concerning the attack. The first has to do with intelligence. While it's certainly possible that the killer acted alone, using a submachine gun he stole from his father, it's hard to comprehend why the father would keep such a weapon in the house even after his son served a five-year sentence for trying to snatch a rifle from a soldier.

Furthermore, although security forces knew that Milhem was in the area of his hometown of Arara – there were clear indications that he was there hours after the shooting – it took a long time to get to him. The fact that he was hiding out in a more-or-less obvious place – an unoccupied house belonging to a family member – compounds the sense of failure.

The episode is reminiscent of the 2014 abduction-killing of three Israeli teens. In that case, the victims were buried in a plot belonging to the family of one of the terrorists, who hid in a building belonging to an extended family member. The takeaway – that fugitives often seek shelter in places that they know well – makes the fact it took eight days to get to Milhem even puzzling.

Still, on a more strategic level, it is important to note that even if Milhem's shooting spree really was a "lone wolf" attack (at this point, it is not at all clear that that was the case), the excellent intelligence deployment of the Shin Bet security services in the Palestinian territories and among Israeli Arabs doesn't make it easy to deal with the problem.

There is a genuine difficulty among the intelligence community in countering the impossible challenge of "lone wolves" with access to weapons, who set out one fine day, without any prior warning, to carry out an attack.

The Shin Bet has had multiple successes in recent weeks thwarting organized terror cells sporting multiple members. The problem is that these days, there is an ever-growing mass of incidents – especially in the West Bank, where they are a daily occurrence – involving attackers who don't rely on what the security establishment terms "terror infrastructure."

And then there's the attitude of the Israel Police, which last week gave many citizens the sense that it was downplaying their genuine fears amid ongoing uncertainty and reports that Milhem could strike again.

But perhaps even more troubling than the security establishment's dubious ability to cope with the situation was support for the attack among Israel's Arab population. True, there were many condemnations, even among Milhem's own neighbours. And yet it is becoming increasingly clear that the killer may have received help not only from his own family, but also from other friends and acquaintances. For one thing, we still don't know who helped him get to Arara from Tel Aviv after carrying out the attack.

And of course, after he was killed by security forces, there was that – albeit small – demonstration during which young Arabs chanted, "With blood, with fire, we'll avenge the martyr." Milhem, we must recall, had murdered not only two Jews, Alon Bakal and Shimon Ruimi, but also an Arab resident of Lod, Ayman Shaaban.

Hamas, as expected, jumped on the bandwagon and embraced the murderer as a role model, while the Palestinian Authority equivocated, calling him a "martyr" but refusing to award him the status that would entitle his family to financial aid. Meanwhile, the ultra-radical Islamic State group appeared to scramble to declare that Milhem was one of its own, crowning Milhem an Islamic State martyr for Palestine in a statement whose authenticity has yet to be established.

Finally, the big question that everyone here – Jews and Arabs alike – should be losing sleep over is whether Milhem's action will sweep up and inspire others, sparking a trend among young Israeli Arabs. If, heaven forbid, a similar incident were to occur again, the already delicate relations between Jews and Arabs could sustain a heavy blow, and everyone will pay a price.

Almost as expected in times like these, the voice of the Israeli Arab leadership is not being heard very loudly. Members of Knesset known for their vehement condemnations when Palestinians are accidentally killed by IDF soldiers, go silent when an Arab is murdered by another Arab.

True, some of them condemned the Tel Aviv attacks. But since the slaying of Milhem, not one of them has stood in front of the cameras and called on his or her supporters to denounce the likes of Milhem. For them, to condemn the death of an Arab at the hands of another Arab would simply be bad politics. ■

Killer's relative arrested on suspicion of being accomplice

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

A relative of Tel Aviv gunman Nashat Milhem was remanded into custody on Jan. 10 on suspicion of playing "a central role" as an accomplice in the Jan. 1 killings, a TV report said.

The male suspect was first arrested on Jan. 5, and police have "strong evidence" connecting him to the killings, Channel 10 said.

Two days after Israeli Arab Milhem was cornered in his home village of Arara and shot dead when he opened fire on the forces that had come to arrest him, security forces continued to arrest suspects who may have helped him before and after he killed three Israelis in Tel Aviv, and continued to search several homes belonging to the wider Milhem family in Arara.

The killer's father Mohammed and his brother Ali were released from detention Sunday, with limitations placed on their movement.

"If I had been an accomplice, you wouldn't be seeing me here now," said Mohammed Milhem after his release.

He also said he was not angry with the Shin Bet for arresting him, and that he had fully co-operated with the Israeli law enforcement authorities.

Channel 10 said the father told one of its reporters that he wished Nashat had been captured alive, as the security forces had also intended. "Why did they have to kill him?" he reportedly asked.

Some relatives from the wider Milhem family protested that security personnel had destroyed property, and even stolen valuables, during searches last Sunday in Arara.

JERUSALEM

The fire that gutted the Jerusalem offices of the human rights group B'Tselem on Jan. 10 was likely caused by an electrical fault, firefighters said, all but ruling out earlier assessments that the blaze was caused by an arson attack.

"In light of an initial investigation being carried out by the special investigations team of [the] Jerusalem fire and rescue [service], we're looking into a high probability option that the fire was started following a fault in the office's electrical systems," a spokesman for the fire brigade said.

The commander of the Jerusalem District Fire Brigade told Israel Radio that investigators were still awaiting the verdict of an electrical engineer, but that it was "reasonable to assume," from the fact that the fire started in an acoustic ceiling, that the cause was an electrical short circuit.

Security camera footage that emerged last Monday afternoon appeared to show the electrical short that caused the fire.

Moshe Lazari, a fire investigator, told the radio station that the possibility of an electrical short circuit was being looked at, although the investigation was ongoing and no definite conclusions had been reached by press time on Monday.

> We are breathing freely again after the announcement of the fire services that in all likelihood there was an electrical short circuit. We're going back to normal.

Lazari said the investigative team had neither found graffiti nor smelled any inflammable material, clues that led police to the far-right perpetrators of an arson attack at the Hand in Hand Jewish-Arab school in Jerusalem in November 2014.

Police were waiting for the fire service's official report before announcing their conclusions, a spokesman said.

"We are breathing freely again after the announcement of the fire services that in all likelihood there was an electrical short circuit," B'Tselem said in a statement. "We're going back to normal."

Earlier reports said the speed with which the fire spread supported suspicions of arson.

B'Tselem's first-floor offices were empty at the time of the fire and there were no injuries there. However, a cantor at a synagogue on the building's fourth floor was taken to Hadassah Hospital in the Ein Kerem neighbourhood. He suffered from smoke inhalation and his injuries were described as "very light."

The fire began at 10 p.m. Sunday. Acting Jerusalem Fire Brigade commander Eyal Cohen said six fire-fighting teams arrived with a crane to battle the blaze.

Police instructed the offices to remain closed Monday until investigators had examined the premises, and a security officer was posted at the building's entrance. Over recent months, amid ongoing threats, the entrance to the office had been guarded from time to time.

Late Sunday, when assessments still pointed at an arson attack, B'Tselem said that despite the incident, it would not be deterred.

"Naturally, the damage to our offices will not stop our work of documenting and exposing the harm to human rights under the occupation," the group said in a statement.

B'Tselem director Hagai El-Ad said he didn't want to speculate. "We will not say anything until the facts are clear."

El-Ad told Army Radio that whether or not the fire turned out to have been caused by arson, there has been a "harsh and dangerous atmosphere of incitement against human rights activists and especially people and organizations working for human rights in the [West Bank]."

While criticism was legitimate, he continued, and his organization welcomed any opportunity to conduct a "substantive debate," organizations like B'Tselem were being persecuted as part of an "atmosphere" running from the Prime Minister's Office, through the Justice Ministry to right-wing groups such as Im Tirtzu.

Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked's bill requiring Israeli non-governmental organizations to publicly declare their foreign government funding is moving toward passage, after it was approved by a cabinet committee at the end of December. Shaked has said the legislation will uncover foreign meddling in Israeli affairs. ■

Adel Milhem, a relative whose home was searched, pointed to a family car that had been smashed, and said the forces had stolen gold, silver and jewelry when searching his home. "I had nothing to do with (the crime)," said Adel. "My car and home are destroyed. They should just kill me."

Another relative, Umeila, said the searchers had ripped the sink out of her wall, destroyed her TV set, and trashed her home.

Suspects were arrested in Arara and also in the nearby village of Bartaa, where one arrest was filmed.

Nashat Milhem was killed in a shootout with police and the Shin Bet on Jan. 8 a week after he killed three Israelis – Alon Bakal, Shimon Ruimi and Amin Shaaban – in Tel Aviv on Jan. 1 and then fled a massive police manhunt to hide in his hometown in the northern Israeli village of Arara. According to officials, he was not affiliated with any organized terror group, but is believed to have been motivated by a jihadist ideology.

Public defender Nechami Feinblatt, who represents the Milhem family, told Army Radio earlier on the day that he had secured the release of Mohammed and Ali Milhem after reaching an agreement with the Shin Bet.

"I think the Shin Bet understands that the family wanted to help capture him and not help him [escape]," he said.

In the days following the shooting, Milhem's father and brothers Juadat and Ali, together with five other relatives and friends, were arrested on suspicion of premeditated manslaughter, being an accessory to murder, illegal association and conspiracy to commit a crime.

Hours after the shootings, Mohammed went to local police and told them he had recognized his son as the gunman from TV broadcasts of security camera footage of the attack.

A few days later, he made a televised plea to his son to turn himself in, as Tel Aviv residents hunkered down amid ongoing searches for the gunman. "Contact me," Mohammed said, appealing directly to his son. "I will help you. Let's end this saga. These are difficult days for the family."

On Jan. 5, Juadat Milhem, the terrorist's brother, repeated that plea after he was freed from police custody.

Feinblatt told Israeli media that while Mohammed had been in touch with his son after the murders, he had "certainly not" helped him escape. He said that security officials were made aware of the phone call between the two.

On Jan. 3, police found DNA evidence indicating Milhem was in his hometown of Arara, and he was eventually tracked to an abandoned house in the town.

The structure was surrounded last Friday afternoon, and according to police, Milhem spotted the forces converging upon him. He fired on them from the window of the apartment, fled the building, and ran some 200 meters before he was gunned down by security forces. The forces had been ordered to take him alive if possible.

The next day, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warned would-be attackers that anyone who targets Israelis would suffer a similar fate.

"Let all who wish to murder Israelis know that sooner or later we will reach them, inside the borders of the nation and outside of them," Netanyahu said in a statement. "No one is immune. We will get to the killers and to all those who aided them."

President Reuven Rivlin said Israelis "will not bow our heads in the face of the depraved terror we are facing in this difficult period."

He praised the actions of security forces over the past week to locate Milhem.

"We will continue to choose life, even when in pain, even when the price we pay is heavy and so very difficult," Rivlin said.

Opposition leader Isaac Herzog meanwhile blasted the erection of a mourning tent in Milhem's honour in East Jerusalem over the weekend, calling those behind it "enemies of Israel."

Herzog called Milhem "a despicable murderer" and said Israel would not rest until it had eradicated the "pockets of hate and incitement" which lead to terror attacks against innocents. ■

Mein Kampf sale in Germany touches off heated debate

BERLIN

Adolf Hitler's last official residence, the German state of Bavaria has kept the copyright of the genocidal dictator's Mein Kampf under lock and key since the end of World War II. Forced into the role of a taboo's reluctant guardian and although most historians see it as an important source on the Nazi period, for 70 years the state has prohibited publication of Hitler's monstrous autobiographic manifesto of anti-Semitic ideology. That copyright expired on Dec. 31, 2015.

Hitting the shelves in Germany on Jan. 8, the Munich-based Institute for Contemporary History's (ICH) re-published Mein Kampf is a heavily annotated edition with commentary almost as long as the 800-page original text. Work on the annotated version took three years and for the research community, this new two-volume edition is an opportunity to finally fill a major gap.

While both sides of the controversial public debate wonder about the efficacy – and need – of republishing Hitler's lengthy screed, many don't realize that, alongside other excerpted texts of Nazi propaganda, Mein Kampf is already included in standard German history textbooks.

When the ICH presented the project to an international commission of researchers, it garnered approval from historians including Dan Michman, head of the International Institute for Holocaust Research at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. The new edition retails for 60 euros ($90) and its initial print run of 4,000 sold out on the first day. But as the first print publication of Mein Kampf in Germany since 1944, it has set off heated discussion in both domestic and international forums.

Upon the book's publication last week, World Jewish Congress president Ronald S. Lauder released a statement condemning the scholarly endeavour. "It would be best to leave Mein Kampf where it belongs: the poison cabinet of history… This project may be well-intended, but the Bavarian government was right not to allow its republication until the expiry of the copyright, or to support a new edition financially," says Lauder.

Head of the Institute for Contemporary History Andreas Wirsching says, however, publishing the scholarly edition promotes responsible research and counters unannotated versions that Germans can easily buy online through international booksellers. The annotated edition "contributes to the urgently needed demystification of this crucial Nazi-era text," says Wirsching.

Indeed, most scholars agree it's high time Mein Kampf be stripped of its mystical aura, and that continued censorship is counterproductive to that goal.

"What can't be examined, can't be discussed – is mystified instead," writes Christoph Schwennicke, the editor-in-chief of the German political monthly Cicero in a recent article. He calls for an open examination of its content, and wonders whether its publication is not long overdue.

"Isn't it relevant to know the train of thought that fed the German catastrophe?" he writes.

Even the leader of Germany's Jewish community, Joseph Schuster, has agreed that the book can contribute to a greater understanding of the Nazi era and the Holocaust and is in favour of an annotated edition.

But now that it can theoretically be published freely, Schuster emphatically warns against uncontrolled circulation of unannotated Mein Kampf editions. He has called on the German state's institutions to do all they can to prevent its sale and distribution.

This public call against unannotated distribution does not go far enough for Charlotte Knobloch, head of Munich's Jewish community and commissioner for Holocaust memory at the World Jewish Congress.

In a recent conversation, Knobloch told the Times of Israel that selling Mein Kampf in Germany in any form is a slap in the face to Holocaust survivors' associations worldwide that, she says, can't grasp that the book will be again legally available in Germany.

"The fact is, just dealing with the book raises interest in it – and that interest, for many, is not in the commentary but in the original text," says Knobloch, who fears the annotated editions won't hit their mark.

At the moment, it looks as though the annotated edition of Mein Kampf is still likely to be the only one on sale in German bookstores. German justice officials have announced that anyone who publishes the book without proper commentary will be prosecuted for inciting racial hatred, under the unique law which allows Germany's democracy to defend itself against anti-democratic forces.

> No one voluntarily tortures himself through Hitler's Mein Kampf. It's too badly written for that.
> Volker Beck, German politician

However, taking a clear stance on the question of how the book should be handled in schools, Knobloch also vehemently opposes covering Mein Kampf in the classroom.

"There's generally too little time in class to deal with National-Socialism, the Holocaust and the Second World War in a substantial way. It doesn't make sense to spend the little time there is reading hate speech," she says.

Orthodox Berlin-based Rabbi Yehuda Teichtal echoes those fears, saying that the risk of introducing it into schools is greater than the "doubtful benefit of teaching it as a vaccine against extremism."

But German education representatives disagree and those supporting discussion of excerpts of Mein Kampf in schools include German Education Minister Johanna Wanka. Now that it's such a hot topic in the media, Wanka says, students will have questions concerning the book. It needs to be talked about in classrooms, she told a Bavarian newspaper.

The longtime president of Germany's teacher's association Josef Kraus agrees, saying rather than students secretly buying the book online, it is better to turn it into a topic of classroom discussion, where history or politics teachers have a chance of influencing them.

"Professional treatment of excerpts in class can make an important contribution to inoculating young people against political extremism," Kraus argues, adding that its "dangerous" ideology would only be suitable only for older students from the ages of 16 or 17.

However critics of the education system point out that in some German states, history lessons are down to only one hour a week for certain age groups. With teachers rushing to expose students to the basics, is there enough class time to properly discuss the text?

And the other less publicized component of Germany's internal debate is that many think Mein Kampf is simply a bad book. It is too boring and cumbersome to give to students, they say.

"No one voluntarily tortures himself through Hitler's Mein Kampf. It's too badly written for that," prominent Green party politician Volker Beck, head of the important German-Israeli parliamentary group, told the German daily Handelsblatt.

And perhaps there are better texts to address anti-Semitism and Nazi ideology. "The book is confusing and bulky, and therefore hard to apply in class," says Ulrich Bongertmann of the Association of German History Teachers. He names the 1920 Nazi party platform or the Nazis' own school propaganda texts as more suitable alternatives.

Interestingly, Nazi era texts are already used in other school subjects, such as German language studies. Since it is part of the state curriculum for German high school majors to identify "rhetorical strategies that are used to influence readers or listeners," Joseph Goebbels's Sportpalace speech and other Nazi diatribe are used to discuss oratorical devices and look at differences between news and propaganda, and demagogical and charismatic leadership.

This use of Nazi texts, including Mein Kampf, has already caused pushback from students. In a recent newspaper op-ed, 16-year-old high school student Noah Gottschalk harshly criticized the idea of using Mein Kampf in German lessons.

In his article "Hitler instead of Schiller?" he opines that from a literary and stylistic perspective, Hitler's hate manifesto belongs in the trash and does not deserve to be taught next to the great names of German literature.

And as a writer for the conservative German daily Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung pointed out, it would actually be an ironic twist of history to make Mein Kampf required reading at schools. It would be giving it merit it did not even receive in Hitler's own time. Although the book was widely read in schools during the Nazi period, it was never a mandatory part of the curriculum.

Mein Kampf has been available in Canadian retailers for decades and many editions are currently available on Amazon.ca. In 2014, a 99-cent version was the top-selling book on iTunes Canada's politics and current events list. ■

Howard Podeswa's Heaven, below, and Hell inset.

Koffler exhibit re-imagines historic paintings

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto artist Howard Podeswa's family roots run deep in the world of art. He is the son of the late artist Yidel Podeswa, and his grandfather, the late Chaim Pinchas Podeszwa (with a "z"), was an artist as well.

Podeswa's latest installation, A Brief History, was influenced by physicist and author Stephen Hawking's book, A Brief History of Time. Opening Jan. 14, it explores artistic legacies by re-imagining historic paintings.

"It doesn't say what it is a brief history of, so it can allude to many things, which is very important to me and all the work that I do. I want people coming to the show to bring their own associations," explains Podeswa, who this year marks 30 years as a professional artist with 13 collections to his credit.

One of the inspirations for this show is a painting of a church dome made famous by Francisco Goya's Cupola of San Antonio de la Florida. One of the Podeswa paintings in the show is a large black circle with things going on inside called Hell, and the other, more hopeful large painting, is Heaven set against a largely white background of floating circles, and within these circles are miniature worlds that fill up the entire canvas.

"The viewer is in the middle between those two," Podeswa explains. "In a way, A Brief History is the life you live between those two end points."

In this show, he also examines the issue of mortality. The concept of hell for him was all the fears we have around mortality and the end of civilization that bring you around to the beginning and the end of the universe itself.

"My mind took me all the way to historical endings that people like Goya were interested in and to the ending of everything and the beginning of everything, which is what Hawking is interested in."

Podeswa primarily works in oils. "The work I do is theme-based," he explains. "Something will grab my attention, and I marshal all my resources around it, and then I produce a body of work related to that, although I may have to change the style and the way I work in order to realize that particular vision."

His past shows included delving into the old masters and looking at how iconic paintings of theirs have influenced other artists over the years and how this has been passed down to generations of artists.

Podeswa started with Spanish painter, Diego Velazquez' 1656 painting called Las Meninas, at the Museo Nacional del Prado in Madrid. Upon seeing the painting, Podeswa felt he should put down his brushes and walk away because Velazquez had mastered everything in this painting that anyone had ever wanted to do, and in a way that Podeswa never thought anyone else could do.

"I became obsessed with the painting," he admits. "I just thought I would have to recreate it and pick it apart. As an artist, whatever I am going through becomes the work. The whole process of doing it became the basis of my next many shows. I did a show based on my reactions to Velazquez, then another two shows based on my reactions to Rembrandt and Goya."

In simplest terms, Podeswa deconstructs a piece and then recreates it. Take his Rembrandt's Night Watch for example: Podeswa measured all the significant compositional points and graphed them all out so as to understand how Rembrandt created so well the illusion of a three-dimensional space on a flat surface. Using these points without taking away Rembrandt's narrative, Podeswa created a life-size painting.

Podeswa, who is also film and television director Jeremy (Game of Thrones) Podeswa's brother, says being Jewish affects his makeup. "It affects everything, but it is very subtle," he reflects. "I'm concerned with existential questions, which is not by any means just a Jewish trait but something we have quite strongly in our culture." ■

New Steinsaltz book offer homilies on weekly parshahs

MARTIN LOCKSHIN

One of the most prolific contemporary Jewish authors is Israel's Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz (Even-Yisrael). Author of some 60 books and many articles, on subjects ranging from zoology to theology, he was once described aptly by Time magazine as a "once-in-a-millennium scholar."

Rabbi Steinsaltz is famous for his monumental project of making the central text of rabbinic Judaism, the Babylonian Talmud, accessible to a wider readership than in any previous era of history. Diving into the so-called "sea of the Talmud" is a daunting task for most novices. Most of the text is written in a dialect of ancient Aramaic that no one speaks today. In standard editions the Talmud (with its 10 to 30 volumes, depending on the edition) has no punctuation, no vowels and no notes meant for the beginning reader. Teachers of Talmud know how difficult it is to start off a new student, since every volume seems to assume that readers know all the other volumes.

Rabbi Steinsaltz rose to the challenge, publishing a new, handsome edition of the Talmud that translated the text into modern Hebrew and provided readers with useful maps, illustrations, linguistic notes, summaries, introductions and footnotes. Recently Rabbi Steinsaltz and the team that he directs undertook the even more challenging task of making this edition available in English translation. (In 2012, I wrote a favourable review of the first volume of this project in these pages.)

Although in many senses Rabbi Steinsaltz looks like and strives to be a haredi (fervently Orthodox) Jew, his Talmud is considered controversial and overly innovative in most haredi circles. Hard as it may be to believe, one of the biggest issues is the layout of the pages. Some conservative students of the Talmud see the "traditional" pagination and shape of each page as sacrosanct. Some felt that his reorganizing the page to find room for his new commentary made the project unkosher. But the biggest controversies about Rabbi Steinsaltz relate to the few books he published decades ago about the personalities of biblical characters. While they contain nothing that would be labelled biblical criticism, the picture that Rabbi Steinsaltz painted of our forefathers and foremothers was not sufficiently reverential in the eyes of some haredi critics. On the web today, you can still find broadsides against Rabbi Steinsaltz, lambasting him for describing our forefather Isaac as being "hesitant," for saying that his wife Rebecca knew "his weaknesses," or for describing Moses as having "limitations." While for most Jews (and others) who read the Bible such human descriptions of biblical characters enrich our reading of the text, in haredi circles, they are incompatible with the veneration required. Rabbi Steinsaltz, understanding that challenges to his Orthodoxy were not in his best interest, apologized and rewrote various allegedly controversial passages.

The recent publication of Talks on the Parasha, a new book by Rabbi Steinsaltz on the biblical portions read in synagogue every Shabbat, made me wonder whether he was treading again on dangerous ground. He isn't.

The book is not really a commentary on the biblical text, but a series of sermons or homilies that take off from a point in the weekly Torah portion. But instead of returning to the text itself, Rabbi Steinsaltz finds an uplifting lesson to teach. For example, this week's Torah portion, Bo (Exodus 10:1-13:16), deals frequently with the theme of "first borns": the Egyptians' first borns die, the Israelites' first borns are consecrated to God, and their first-born animals also require special treatment. In later sections of the Torah, special status is assigned to first fruits, the first harvest and the first shearing of the fleece of sheep and goats.

Maggid Books

> It shows... his desire to inspire, to teach and to challenge us to be better people.

Rabbi Steinsaltz explains this phenomenon psychologically. The explanation, he writes, "lies not in the first born's own essential worth, but in the special feeling and affection that we have for things that are first. The first fruit is not necessarily the choicest, but our connection to it is deepest."

Rabbi Steinsaltz points out that the Bible teaches us that the first-born child, special status notwithstanding, is not always the ideal person to carry on the traditions of the family or people. (The oldest child of neither Abraham nor Isaac nor Jacob becomes the leader of the clan, and this pattern repeats itself often in later biblical books.) In the animal world, "scientific literature has shown... that the first born in many animal species have a much lower survival rate than offspring born to their mothers thereafter."

According to Rabbi Steinsaltz, the Torah acknowledges the strength of human feelings toward things that are "first" not because they are in any sense better but in order to teach us to acknowledge the potential of "firsts" in our lives and take advantage of them. Based on the biblical verse "Like arrows in the hand of a warrior, so are the children of youth" (Psalms 127:4), Rabbi Steinsaltz teaches "the arrows that we shoot when we are still 'children of youth' are like 'arrows in the hands of a warrior,' in that they cannot be repeated. To be sure... even in old age, it is still possible to continue growing... But new experiences no longer come with the same regularity."

Rabbi Steinsaltz established his reputation on his ability to read texts closely and to teach others how to do so. While this latest book does not do that, it shows another side of his personality, his desire to inspire, to teach and to challenge us to be better people, as rabbis have done from time immemorial. ■

The best Jewish comedy of our generation

Michael Fraiman

Imagine joining your girlfriend on a cabin trip with her closest high school friends. You don't know any of them, and you quickly feel left out: they make jokes you don't get, they ignore you when you try to fit in. They mention a summer when "everything changed, and we were forever linked."

You ask what that means, and your girlfriend casually explains: "There was this one time after prom when we were all driving to this very cabin, and things got a little out of hand and we accidentally ran over a lumberjack. We buried him in the woods, but then he was resurrected by the devil. I guess you kinda had to be there."

That's what played out last Wednesday night at 10:30 p.m., when the FXX network quietly debuted the second season of a show called Man Seeking Woman, a dark indie comedy starring Jay Baruchel – the jittery Ottawa-born, Montreal-raised Jewish actor probably best known for voicing Hiccup in the How to Train Your Dragon series.

The show is easily the most creative thing on television today. It's a world where minuscule fears are blown into surreal proportions: when that zombie lumberjack breaks down a door to find Baruchel struggling over a puzzle alone, the horror music cuts and the creature asks, confused, "Who're you?"

Not to beat around the bush or anything, but if you like early Woody Allen (and you're reading The CJN, so don't pretend you don't), you should honestly watch this show. It expertly blends the modern surrealist esthetic touted by Louie or Last Man on Earth with absurd, bite-sized sketch concepts from late-night TV. (Plus it's shot in Toronto, and who doesn't love watching the Queen streetcar roll across what's meant to be a downtown Chicago avenue?)

It's a shame last year's debut season garnered only 200,000 viewers per episode – despite the series' critical acclaim, this season may only be hanging on by a thread. Some audiences might be turned off by the show's flippancy – it's really just a hodgepodge of high-concept gags with no real consequence. (While the zombie-jack murders some of those cabin kids – including, fun fact, CJN profile subject Jonathan Keltz – all we hear are background screams: "There's so much blood!")

The show's basic plot follows Baruchel's character, a mopey guy named Josh Greenberg, trying to get over a nasty breakup he suffered in the series premiere. But everything that can go wrong does: after his first post-breakup blind date is with an actual troll in an ill-fitting hot-pink tube dress, he later discovers his ex's next boyfriend is literally Adolf Hitler, 124 years old and stuck in a wheelchair.

The show's brainchild is Simon Rich, a 30-year-old comedic wunderkind who graduated from Harvard into a job as the youngest-ever writer for Saturday Night Live. "Being Jewish influences me a lot when I'm writing comedy," Rich told the Jewish Chronicle in 2010. "The God of the Old Testament is the original comic character. He's irrational, he's reckless, he has unlimited power. The stakes are so high and he can just do whatever he wants. People are powerless."

A lot of Rich's comedy apparently comes from this feeling of hopelessness, this sense of abject desperation in the face of a world you cannot control. In that way, Man Seeking Woman is strikingly biblical – it's the Book of Job, if Job had to go on a blind date with an actual troll.

The show's brilliance comes from unlocking our deepest fears – being left out, breaking up, rejection – and showing how big they feel, despite how small we know we are. That contradiction is the key, and it's in this proud tradition of helpless Jewish comedians – not just the universal pessimism of Allen, but the high-concept weirdness of Charlie Kaufman, the comic absurdity of Mel Brooks and the everyday observations of Jerry Seinfeld and Larry David – that Man Seeking Woman places Rich firmly in the canon of fine Jewish comedy. ■

Remembering the Alamo, and a few ghosts

MICHAEL STAVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Even during the day, San Antonio, Texas can be a spooky place.

This southern Texas city of nearly two million people was the site of numerous battles during the 19th-century Texas revolution against Mexico. Founded along the quaint San Antonio River, the city is home to several Spanish missions recently designated a UNESCO World Heritage site. The history of San Antonio goes back hundreds of years, with nearly as many ghost stories.

The most famous landmark is the Alamo. Founded in the early 1700s as Mission San Antonio De Valero, the outpost preached Catholicism to local Native American tribes. The site remained in Mexican hands until 1835 when it was lost to the Texan army in the Battle of Bexar. The Mexican army regained control in March 1836 following the infamous Battle of the Alamo. This resounding defeat galvanized the Texan army who rallied around Sam Houston and forced the Mexican army back across the Rio Grande River.

Today, the Alamo Plaza, the area surrounding the original building, encompasses numerous family tourist attractions within several blocks. The street immediately in front of the building is zoned for pedestrian traffic only. With hundreds of lives lost at this spot, it's considered hallowed ground. It was here that our walk began with the Sisters Grimm Ghost Tour.

Shortly after sunset on a hot and steamy night, we were told of the ferocious hand-to-hand fighting that took place in the Alamo barracks in front of us. Most historians place the number of dead at around 500. Apparently, several weeks following the battle, Mexican Gen. Santa Anna sent his soldiers back to the Alamo to destroy the building, in order to prevent it from becoming a rallying point for the Texan rebels. The soldiers were greeted by several ghostly figures, brandishing flaming swords, warning the soldiers not to touch the Alamo. Santa Anna's men fled in fear.

Adjacent to the Alamo sits one of the oldest continuously operating hotels west of the Mississippi River. The Menger Hotel first opened in 1859. The staff claims some 38 different spirits haunt the hotel. With an admittedly spooky vibe, one can easily imagine the Menger as the setting for a horror film.

The hotel has several well-known ghosts. There's chambermaid Sallie White, murdered by her husband in 1876, and buried at the hotel's expense. Rancher Capt. Richard King, founder of King's Ranch in south Texas, who spent his final months in the hotel in 1885. Most famous of all is the ghost of former U.S. president Teddy Roosevelt, who has been seen drinking in the hotel bar.

The historic, and allegedly haunted, Menger Hotel, left, and restaurants along the San Antonio River. MICHAEL STAVSKY PHOTOS

A short walk from the Menger is the Spanish Governor's Palace, dating to 1722. Named by National Geographic as the "Most Beautiful Building in San Antonio," this small stucco compound is reportedly haunted by a maid who was brutally murdered within its walls.

Walking past numerous 18th and 19th century buildings, we were told stories of soldiers, in various military uniforms, appearing out of thin air. Other haunted buildings formerly housed hospitals or were the sites of gruesome murders.

Among the most vivid tales were those told of the building that's currently the Holiday Inn Express River Walk. Built during the late 19th century as the Bexar County Jail, the building has had numerous guests claiming to have seen unusual occurrences. The second and third floors of the hotel are particularly active, having been the location of the prison's gallows. A prisoner whose 1923 botched hanging led to his near decapitation, is among those who regularly appear as apparitions to guests and staff alike.

> Other haunted buildings formerly housed hospitals or were the sites of gruesome murders.

When not searching for ghosts, visitors enjoy many of San Antonio's other attractions. The River Walk is an eight-kilometre, tree-lined park that snakes along the banks of the San Antonio River downtown. Numerous shops, eateries and hotels surround the scenic path. With San Antonio's mild winter climate, the River Walk is a year-round attraction.

Not to be missed is the Tower of the Americas. Constructed in time for the 1968 San Antonio World's Fair, this 750-foot observation tower provides a stunning 360-degree view of the entire city.

San Antonio's Jewish community is a small, cohesive group that made national headlines this past summer due to a wave of anti-Semitic vandalism that struck the area around Congregation Rodfei Sholom, the city's lone Orthodox synagogue.

Following the incident, many segments of the city's population lent support to the Jewish community. Volunteers aided with the cleanup and increased neighbourhood watch activities in Jewish areas. Rabbi Aryeh Scheinberg, spiritual leader of Rodfei Sholom for nearly 50 years, said following the vandalism, "This is not the San Antonio community. The religious community, the civic community and law enforcement have all been terrific."

Rabbi Scheinberg's personal friend, famed Pastor John Hagee of the nearby Cornerstone Church, spent several hours following the attack visiting Rodfei Sholom. In an effort to illustrate the unity found in San Antonio, Pastor Hagee remarked "If a line has to be drawn, draw it around Christians and Jews. We are united." ■

Michael Stavsky acknowledges the assistance of the San Antonio Convention and Visitor's Bureau in arranging his family's trip to San Antonio.

Filmmaker undergoes taharah in doc about Jewish burial

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Filmmaker Saul Henteleff went to unusual lengths to show authentic taharah practice in his newly released documentary on Jewish death and burial rites. He put himself on the table and underwent the ritual of washing and clothing his body.

"It was easy," Henteleff says of lying on the table undergoing the rituals for cleansing the body and preparing it for Jewish burial. "There was no trauma. And it was a central part of the story.

"It would have been inappropriate to have filmed a real taharah. But since there are no rules against filming the process of taharah on a live volunteer, the Chesed Shel Emes board agreed to go ahead with this," he said, referring to the community organization responsible for this process in Winnipeg.

More than 10 years in the making, Henteleff's documentary, My Jewish Death debuted last month at the Berney Theatre (in the Asper Jewish Community Campus), as part of the Chesed Shel Emes annual appreciation evening for staff and volunteers. The event attracted more than 100 supporters.

In introducing the documentary, the filmmaker and high school film studies teacher noted that his journey into Jewish death and dying began with the funeral of Sheldon Oberman in 2004. Oberman was a popular teacher at the Gray Academy (Winnipeg's Jewish day school), a nationally known storyteller and an author of children's books and novels.

Saul Henteleff

> I had never before heard any discussion about a ... Jewish afterlife.

"The day of Obie's funeral was a sad day [Oberman was only in his mid 50s] – but also a memorable one," Henteleff said. "That day changed my life.

"Rabbi Neal Rose, in his eulogy, spoke about Obie's soul still being with us in the sanctuary. I had never before heard any discussion about a Jewish spirit or Jewish afterlife."

Henteleff's quest to learn more about Jewish death and dying led him to the Chesed Shel Emes where, he said, he met a lot of wonderful people and became involved in the Chesed activities himself.

The half-hour documentary begins with Henteleff jogging while his voice-over introduces his spiritual quest. This is followed by scenes from a chevra kadisha cemetery conference in Portland, Ore., in 2007, which he attended.

The chevra kadisha are the men and women who perform the taharah rituals. In Winnipeg, taharahs are performed by a team of three volunteers for each body – with teams of women for female bodies and teams of men for male bodies. The process involves washing the body and clothing the body in simple white shrouds consisting of a top, bottoms, and a hood, prior to transferring the deceased into a coffin.

Most of the film shows Henteleff's taharah as he is pulled from an enclosure, transferred to the table, cleansed, clothed, had soil from Israel applied to his eyelids and transferred to a coffin. We also watch as the pallbearers carry the coffin to the hearse for transport to the cemetery and the lowering of the coffin into the grave, where the viewer is looking up from inside the grave itself as the pallbearers shovel the earth on top of the coffin.

Throughout, there are breaks for commentaries from rabbis Neal Rose, Allan Green of Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Congregation, and Ari Ellis, until a few months ago, the spiritual leader of the Adas Yeshurun Herzlia Synagogue.

Henteleff singled out several people who were important contributors to the making of the documentary – in particular, Winnipeg-based Jewish composer Sid Robinovitch for his musical score.

The documentary was followed by a panel consisting of Henteleff, Chesed Shel Emes executive director Rena Boroditsky and Rabbi Green fielding questions from the audience.

Among the questions were ones about embalming and the use of chemicals to preserve the body (none are used in Jewish burials), whether or not a coffin is a religious requirement (no) and how the chevra kadisha works with a damaged body. ("We do the best we can," Boroditsky said.)

One questioner asked Henteleff how the ritual speaks to secular people. His response was that everyone can appreciate on a human level the feeling of being cared for.

When asked if his film students are going to see the documentary, he noted that he expected some of them to be at the screening at Cinematheque after the film's debut last month.

No further screenings are currently planned. ■

Harry & David, the jewel of Oregon

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

This fall, my husband, Jack, and I visited Oregon to attend yet another dental course. Dental courses are Jack's passion. The course was to take place in Portland, but my passion – food and all that goes with it – had to be satisfied as well.

To realize this goal, we started by taking a trek to Medford, Ore., in the beautiful Rogue Valley. Medford is four hours south of Portland by car and the home of Harry & David, a premium food and gift producer and retailer known worldwide for its famous Royal Riviera pears. Its products are sold in its retail stores, online and through direct mail. Harry & David also sells its wares under the brands Wolferman's and Cushman's.

The product lines from these three brands include gift baskets, chocolates, candies, baked goods, their famous Moose Munch popcorn treats, wine, fruit and flowers. Harry & David delivers to Canada, and its products are kosher. Products, gift baskets and fruit can be found at harryanddavid.com.

The Harry & David factory tour, the reason we were in Medford, must be booked ahead by telephone and costs $5 upon arrival at the Harry & David country store. Along with the tour information, you receive a $5 voucher to use in the store after the tour. I was really excited to be attending the tour.

We were met by our tour guide, ushered aboard a charming little bus and whisked a short ride away to the Harry & David "campus." Our guide has been with Harry & David for her whole career. She explained that she started out years ago on the production floor working with the pears, and over the years, she learned everything there is to know about Harry & David and its campus.

Oregon landscape

Harry and David were born to southern Oregon Jews living there in the early 1900s. Surrounded by their pear orchards, the brothers decided to create the brilliantly lucrative "Fruit of the Month" club as well as mail order fruit and assorted gift baskets. Their venture grew to an indescribably huge size. From the bus, our guide showed us that the campus contains a pear orchard, flower gardens and many huge buildings. She said similar Royal Riviera pear orchards are located throughout Oregon. The reason is that if some act of nature, such as insects, hail, drought or flooding, affects an orchard in one or two areas, there will still be hope of a good harvest in the other orchards. The pears are harvested in September and put into cold storage. They do not ripen until at least December, so they are perfect to pack in gift baskets or send out in boxes for the holiday season.

The on-site flower gardens are now open to the public. Guests are invited to cut their own bouquet.

Each huge building on the campus has a different purpose, and the buildings we toured had a viewing gallery where we could watch and learn.

We started at the fruit processing plant, which is used for cleaning, weighing, separating, inspecting and then packing the pears. An amazing computerized conveyor belt, holding hundreds of single pears, each in a pocket-like mechanism, moves along and weighs each pear. Then a pear is dropped into the appropriate bin where it is inspected, then packed. The pears that do not pass inspection are either donated where needed or used to make cider. We were told Harry & David is a green company and all the boxes are from recycled paper and made on site.

We bused to the next building and walked in the door to enjoy the amazing smell of chocolate. Here we saw chocolate truffles being made. As we moved along we saw several different types of cookies, coconut macaroons and assorted squares being baked. We continued our tour and got to observe machines that stood two stories high, making popcorn. Meanwhile, nearby in huge cauldrons, the rich, sweet and savoury, buttery caramel was being cooked until just right. The popcorn was spilled out into baskets that hung from the conveyor belt and moved to fill a tank above the cauldron of caramel. The popcorn tank emptied into the caramel mixture and was mechanically stirred then poured out onto another belt that carried it to packaging. If your mouth was not watering when you went in, it would be now!

The last stop was the building where gift basket production is done.

We found the process fascinating. It was explained that the employees, many of whom have been there for 35 years and more and are extremely qualified, still attend "gift basket packing" classes each year. This is because the design of the baskets, the contents and the containers change each year.

Packing pears is an art

These expert packers assemble thousands of identical baskets, each exactly the same as the one before and the one after. Each measure of tissue paper, plastic wrap and ribbon, each fold of packing material, every angle of the products placed in the basket, and each bow tied and decorative garnish attached is exactly the same as you see it in the catalogue or online! Amazing!

On the bus ride back to the Harry & David country store, our guide pointed out shipping and administrative buildings, box-making factories, cold storage buildings, flower warehouses, Internet and telephone ordering facilities, and there were many more buildings still undiscovered.

Of course, as with any tour, we ended up in the "gift shop." But the Harry & David country store is much more than that. It's a complete supermarket with fruits, vegetables, dairy products and such. I had a great time looking at everything and deciding what wonderful Harry & David products I could fit into my suitcase – after all, I have a big family to feed. I decided on an assortment of small boxes of Moose Munch, boxes of assorted chocolates, some interesting spice mixes and several varieties of dry soup mixes. I thought that I chose a well-rounded assortment of products for us to try at home.

Pear, fig and cranberry tart

This tart is a classic French pastry-inspired dessert that starts with a buttery, flaky melt-in-your-mouth crust. Hidden beneath the crunchy topping are sweet figs. Top with a scoop of French vanilla ice cream. Or serve cooled to room temperature and topped with a dollop of fresh cream that has been whipped with a touch of icing sugar and a drizzle of pure vanilla or your favourite fruit liqueur.

Pie

- ❑ 1 cup dried figs (5-1/2 oz.), stemmed and quartered
- ❑ 1 cup water
- ❑ 1/4 cup plus 1/4 cup sugar, plus 1/2 tbsp. more for sprinkling
- ❑ 1 tsp. pure vanilla
- ❑ 6 medium Bosc pears
- ❑ 2 tbsp. cornstarch
- ❑ 1/2 cup reduced sugar dried cranberries
- ❑ 1/2 package of puff pastry, thawed and chilled

Streusel

- ❑ 1/2 cup all-purpose flour
- ❑ 1/2 cup brown sugar, packed
- ❑ 1/4 cup chilled butter, cut into small pieces.

Prepare a 10 inch spring form pan lined with parchment paper

Combine figs, water and 1/4 cup sugar in a small saucepan; add vanilla. Bring to a simmer over medium heat, stirring occasionally. Cook until figs are soft, about 15 minutes. Using a slotted spoon, transfer figs to a small bowl and set aside. Continue simmering syrup until reduced to 1/4 cup, about 10 minutes more. Let cool.

Peel, quarter and core pears, then thinly slice crosswise, place in a large bowl and toss gently with cornstarch, 1/4 cup of remaining sugar, reserved figs, cranberries and syrup. Mix until combined.

Make the streusel crumb topping by mixing the flour and brown sugar together with a fork in a medium bowl. Then mix in the butter with a fork, stirring and blending until the mixture resembles coarse meal. Put aside.

Place a cookie sheet in the bottom third of the oven; preheat oven to 400. Fit the piece of puff pastry dough into the spring form pan. Trim any excess pastry and, using a fork, crimp pastry edges up the side of the pan. Spoon in pear mixture. Top the pie with the crumb topping, place on the cookie sheet in the preheated oven and bake for 40-45 minutes until the crust is a deep golden brown and the filling bubbles. Cool on a rack before serving warm, or refrigerate when cooled. Remove spring form pan and parchment paper before serving. ■

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Staying at home – is it always best?

Dr. Michael Gordon

There seems to be an ongoing tension/tug of war among health-care policy-makers, members of the public and families about where people should live out their later days. I was recently invited to give a public lecture in another province – the topic was to be based on my book, written with my co-author Bart Mindszenthy – Parenting your Parents.

The conference organizer asked me if I was planning to provide strong opinions about the benefits of nursing homes for frail elders. He was concerned that, considering the government funding of the lecture, I not should espouse opinions in conflict with current government public policy, which is to try and keep elders in their own homes.

Aside from the idea that at an invited public lecture there would be a concern about what the speaker would be emphasizing, the issue raised for me important thoughts about the decision that many elders and their families must face as to where they should live during the later days, or often years, of their life.

It reminded me of the experience I shared with my sister when it came to trying to convince my late father that he would be better off moving from his home, where he had been living on his own since the death of our mother a few years previously. At first glance, he seemed to be "managing" – although in his characteristic "messy" fashion – from the evidence we had: he was still shopping for his personal needs, driving to where he had to go, and he even arranged to have his cataracts successfully treated in a day surgery setting.

I spoke to him at least once a week, and as part of my at distance mental status examination, I would ask him how his stocks were doing and would bring up a topic in the news, as I knew he was an avid New York Times reader. I and/or my sister would visit from time to time, and although were always amazed at the state of the house, which always seemed to be in some process of repair, he seemed to be managing in the restricted confines of the neighbourhood.

He went out in the morning to get the paper, maybe a bagel at the local convenience store or some other minor items, and once a week, he went to a nearby supermarket where he bought supplies paid for on a credit card that my sister co-owned – so she knew that he was shopping regularly.

When things started to very gradually deteriorate, we became convinced that he had to move into a supportive housing environment of some kind. He refused adamantly to consider it – but after a while, and through a long process of his own gradual cognitive decline and recognition of the benefits of a retirement home that he had moved to near my sister on a trial basis, he finally complied. He realized that living alone was no longer a viable choice for him and moved into the facility not far from my sister's home. He eventually required a full-time personal support worker, but for many years, he enjoyed and benefited from the social structure and the activities and support he received.

Living at home sounds great. For those who can do it and have the financial and social means, it might be the best of choices. For many others, the social isolation of living at home may be counter-productive to the need for social interactions that we now recognize as being important for the well-being of those with cognitive decline.

Being a hermit in one's home is not necessarily good for frail elders. Each individual and family must make the best decision for them. Governments should avoid forcing people, through public policy and financial means, away from finding the best solution for their personal, social, familial and economic needs. ■

Yacov Fruchter says freedom requires moral and community-building sensitivities
Rabbi Shalom Spira examines how the laws of the new moon so confounded Moses
Rachael Turkienicz explains why the Jews needed to leave Egypt to receive the Torah

Yacov Fruchter

"But if the household is too small for a lamb, let him share one with a neighbour who dwells nearby, in proportion to the number of persons, each according to his ability to eat" (Exodus 12:4).

Before being freed from Egypt, the Israelites are instructed that on the 10th of the month, they're to select a lamb to be slaughtered and eaten on the night of the 14th, the original Passover.

Most explanations of this focus on the significance of the lamb, which was worshipped by Egyptians. By slaughtering a lamb, an Egyptian god, the Israelites experienced a psychological shift that prepared them for liberation. But in the act of asserting their freedom and dignity, they're instructed to remain thoughtful and to act with moderation. As the quote says, they were required to select a lamb that was an appropriate size for each household. If this act was about revenge alone, there'd be no need to limit the size of the lamb. If this was purely about asserting autonomy, or that lambs couldn't possibly be gods, there would be no need to create boundaries on the damage caused.

This commandment was meant to empower the soon-to-be-freed slaves and to assert God's power, but it's also joined with a clear moral and community-building sensibility. The soon-to-be-freed Israelites need to understand their own physical requirements and what they truly need to live well. From the first act of self-liberation, they're required to act with purpose and not purely on a visceral, albeit warranted, response to years of pent-up hunger and hatred. They don't steal the riches of Egypt, but rather "ask" for it. They don't slaughter more meat than they can consume and eat more than they have an appetite for just to spite the Egyptians. Rather, they immediately need to estimate how much sustenance they'll require and begin to negotiate with their neighbours to find the right balance.

Even before being free, they're instructed to make a conscious decision that's good for them and their neighbours. This is an important reminder as we start 2016. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

Rashi in Exodus 12:2 cites the Mechilta that Moses experienced difficulty understanding the new moon, until the Holy One, blessed be He, pointed (metaphorically speaking) and said, "When it resembles this, sanctify it."

What exactly was so initially unfathomable for Moses? Siftei Chachamim suggests that the Mechilta refers to the Gemara, Rosh Hashanah 20b, which divides the period of the appearance of the new moon into time zones of 18 hours versus six hours. This talmudic passage is the source for the international dateline, and it is so marvellously complex that Chazon Ish (Orach Chaim 64) begins his analysis by advising: "We disturb the reader with this overview." Rabbi Yisrael Rothenburg, (Pesher Chazon, Kiryat Sefer 5772), offers a line-by-line commentary on this chapter of Chazon Ish and reveals a kaleidoscope of opinions on the subject.

Correctly so, Moses was puzzled.

To that effect, Rabbi Joshua H. Shmidman twice confessed: "I am prepared to adjudicate any question except for the dateline." Likewise, Rabbi Yisrael Taplin (Ta'arich Yisrael, Lakewood, 5759), reports from an interview with Rabbi David Feinstein that the latter's father, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, refused to address this issue, because he was baffled about why the community in Harbin considered itself the Far East (instead of the Far West, as Ba'al ha-Ma'or to Rosh Hashanah 20b led him to believe). One might even hypothesize that this halachic polemic translates itself into the conflict between North Korea, and South Korea, which to some extent are geographically separated by Ba'al ha-Ma'or's dateline.

Rabbi Moshe Ashen, writing in Beit Yitzchak, Vol. 39 (5767), compares this dilemma to Shulchan Aruch Orach Chaim (344:1-2) regarding one who is lost in the wilderness and forgets which day is the Sabbath. Each doubtful day is observed as a potential Sabbath, leading to a two-day Sabbath for a number of locations in the Far East and Far West. ■

Rachael Turkienicz

This week we conclude the reading of the plagues brought against Egypt. The text challenges our sensibilities and our Jewish core. We read of suffering and ultimately death that includes children and infants. During Pesach, we are given the seders to debate the definition of an enemy and how far we must go to vanquish an enemy and feel safe. These are ongoing Jewish questions that echo from the ancient world to the modern with haunting relevance.

Amid all of these issues, there is a moment of Jewish definition that is easily missed. At one point, Pharaoh suggests to Moses that the Israelites could worship their God in Egypt. There is no need to leave – Pharaoh would allow Jewish ritual within his borders. Moses refuses, insisting that they must depart. But if Pharaoh is willing to accept the Israelites in their covenantal uniqueness, what's the harm?

Interestingly, the issue does not lie with Pharaoh's perspective, but with ours. Putting issues of trusting Pharaoh aside, the Israelites are headed to Sinai to receive the Torah. Can the Torah be received in Egypt? Absolutely not.

The core for the name "Egypt" in Hebrew is the word "narrow." The Torah cannot be given in a narrow place, since that would restrict its meanings and its messages. God has told Moses to lead Israel into the wilderness, a place with no boundaries and no reference points. The Torah must be given in an environment that does not restrict spiritual growth and dialogue.

In many instances today, we find that the Jewish world can again seek to return to Egypt. Just as the Israelites of the desert spoke nostalgically of Egypt, we can long for a world of strict and narrow definitions. In those moments, we must remind ourselves that Pharaoh's offer was turned down, and instead God led us into a place of broad latitudes. It is there that we can embrace Torah. ■

Interestingly, it is one of the issues near and dear to his heart that has further distanced him from the Liberals – refugees.

Trudeau's announced plan to bring 25,000 Syrian refugees to Canada by the end of 2015 smacks of political opportunism, he said. The plan was conceived in haste to attract votes after a photo of a dead Syrian toddler made international headlines.

Not enough consideration was given to resettling and absorbing the refugees, he said.

What's more, the policy is unfair to the tens of thousands of other refugees who were looking to make Canada their home. There are an estimated 10 to 12 million refugees around the world, Mamann said. Many have been in the queue waiting to come to Canada, and their relatives are calling him, distraught that their family members must wait while Syrians jump the queue.

"They've been waiting for years, and all of a sudden, in the middle of an election campaign, based on one picture, he made a decision," Mamann said.

Stuart Kamenetsky is a member in good standing at Toronto's Congregation Darchei Noam, a synagogue known in good measure for its members' attention to social justice issues.

Kamenetsky, who serves as chair of the synagogue's Israel connections committee, considers himself a progressive, but notes that being right wing does not mean you cannot be an advocate for issues on human rights, the alleviation of poverty, and serve as an advocate for people with differences.

He's also a Tory supporter and has been since Harper became the party leader. The former prime minister, he said, was a visible friend of Israel at a time when other world leaders were not.

Harper "did what he felt was right," even though it likely cost him votes in the overall scheme of things. He recognized the threat posed by ISIS radicalism and made sure Canada did not avoid the issue by sitting on the sidelines.

Kamenetsky, a professor of psychology at the University of Toronto, said he shifted his support to the Tories because of Harper's position on Israel and foreign policy generally.

As someone who spent his formative years in Israel and served in the Israel Defence Forces, he doesn't believe the Liberals really understand what Israel faces. "I don't think they get it," he said.

Canadian and Israeli ministers and diplomats pose during Stephen Harper's 2014 visit.

Although he didn't work for the Tories in the last election – "I don't see myself as politically active" – he is paying close attention to the parties' positions on international issues.

He doesn't see big differences between Liberals and Conservatives on domestic issues so his vote "will have a lot to do with whether the Liberal candidate supports Israel and understands it."

So far, he's pleased with the way Canada voted at the United Nations in November during its annual run of anti-Israel resolutions. For that he credits Harper, whose position against the one-sided resolutions has influenced policy-makers and bureaucrats alike, he said.

You can count Jack Berkovitz among those voters whose Liberal affiliations goes back more than a generation. Both his parents, Holocaust survivors, voted Liberal. He generally voted Liberal, too, as a young man, but that changed in recent years as he moved his vote to the Tories, in part over their position on Israel and because he saw them as the party of good government.

During the last election, the jewelry maven worked for Tory candidates Oliver and Adler in Toronto, and he talked up their prospects with friends and acquaintances.

Support for the Conservatives was strong among Orthodox Jews, he said, but in life, nothing is permanent, including political affiliations. He's taking a wait-and-see approach to the governing Liberals, hoping they will be true to their word about their strong support for Israel.

No group can afford to alienate a government and be seen as permanent supporters of one or another party, so it's best to swing your votes according to the party's actions, he said.

University of Toronto political science professor Nelson Wiseman believes "that it comes down to the fact that there is no one Jewish vote."

Going back decades, you could find Jewish supporters of federal and provincial Conservative parties, some even serving as party leaders, such as Sidney Spivak in Manitoba and Larry Grossman in Ontario. Jewish support for the federal Tories was in the 10 to 15 per cent range, and other ethnic minorities also stayed away from the Tories because of its perception as a "race-proud, Protestant, Anglo, conservative party." Jews, who were on the lower end of the socio-economic strata, also were sympathetic to parties that promised a greater role for the state, he said.

But all that changed over the years, beginning with Tory prime minister John Diefenbaker in the late 1950s, who spoke the language of multiculturalism and opposed the idea of hyphenated Canadians. Meanwhile, Jews improved their economic position in society, felt more integrated and saw their interests better reflected in conservative policies, he said.

A noticeable shift to the Tories began in 2006, accelerated in 2008 and peaked in 2011, when the party received 50 per cent of the Jewish vote, he said.

That support likely dropped in 2015, though he acknowledged there is, as yet, no data to measure minority groups' voting patterns for the last election.

Wiseman suggested that 35 per cent of Jews supported the Conservatives, slightly more than the 32 per cent of the vote the party received overall.

On the issue of Israel, Wiseman discounted the parties' supposed differences on the Jewish state. That has been "exaggerated," he said. "It's more a matter of rhetoric than of policies."

As to the future, that depends, he said. There are a lot of unknowns, including events involving Israel and domestic policies.

Nevertheless, "I don't think Jewish support for the Conservatives will go back to 10 to 15 per cent," he said. ■

Sharren Haskel: Canadian-born MK fights for consumers

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
ISRAEL CORRESPONDENT

Born in Toronto, Sharren Haskel isn't a typical Knesset member. She's 31, a veterinary nurse and a vegan, and perhaps the last person you'd expect to join Benjamin Netanyahu's right-wing Likud party. In last March's Israeli election, Haskel was 31st on the Likud list, but the party only won 30 seats. She took her seat after MK Danny Danon was appointed Israel's envoy to the United Nations last August.

Sharren Haskel

Mazal tov on your new position. How were you feeling after the election in March?
Remember, they predicted that Likud was going to lose the elections. There was a big media war. So the fact that it was a victory, a huge victory, I was just really happy, dancing and celebrating. I didn't think once about my position.

When did you move to Israel?
Both of my parents moved here when I was one year old. They got divorced when I was in high school, and my father moved back to Canada. He lives in Toronto now.

How did you end up going to school in Australia?
After the army, I actually moved to the States. I lived in the United States for a year, in California. My sister lived in California, and I decided to study at Santa Monica College.

After a year, I moved to Sydney. I lived there for about six years. I was working in an animal hospital, volunteering for a wildlife NGO that rescues animals and releases them back into nature.

Four years ago, I decided to move back to Israel, mainly for the reason that Israel is the only true home for Israelis. You can be who you are without any needing to justify it to anyone.

> Four years ago, I decided to move back to Israel, mainly for the reason that Israel is the only true home for Israelis.

That's an unusual background. Was heading to the Knesset part of your plan all along?
Some people say that with my skills dealing with animals, that I actually acquired just the right skills for the "Knesset jungle."

Look, I've always been active in causes like animal welfare and the environment. When I returned to Israel, I was looking into where I could donate some of my skills, time and thoughts. There was one member of Knesset that I've always looked up to, Mickey Eitan. I started to volunteer in his office.

From there, I started getting involved in Likud's branch in my hometown in Kfar Saba. I first got involved in Likud as a student. I just finished a degree in international relations and political science [through Israel's Open University] a few months ago.

Is it fair to say that your political views have shifted over the years?
I grew up as a teenager in a peace camp during the times of [former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin. With all my friends from junior high, we would go to demonstrations for peace. Then the suicide bombings began, and then I joined the army.

I did my military service as a combat soldier in the border patrol, around Jerusalem during the second intifadah. Slowly I grew up. I started shifting my opinions and agendas.

When you've seen people die terrible deaths, and thinking that [the Palestinians] are the people that we wanted to live with, side by side, and the only thing they want to do is to kill Israelis, well, you get a different perspective.

Then, suddenly, the prime minister [Ariel Sharon] decides to completely clear all Jews from Gaza because we think that this is what's going to create peace and quiet. And then, seeing that they've just burned millions of dollars of agricultural equipment that was left for them to start building an economy, voting in a party that has written on its flag to kill all the Jews. The more power the Palestinian Authority had, and the more power Hamas had over territory, over their people, the more violent it became.

It was a long process of sobering up from this dream that was about peace and living one next to another. I say this as someone who grew up with my father, who would take us to Shechem [Nablus] to eat hummus. I knew people who would go to dentists in Kalkiliya. We would buy merchandise for our shop in Gaza.

Israel, for its part, never attacked, just defended itself. We know how to do this really well. No matter what they do, they don't scare us. One day they'll wake up and realize that with violence they will not get anything.

You're the second-youngest Knesset member. Is that an advantage or a disadvantage?
I think it's a huge advantage. When you come in and you're young, whether you've lived here all your life or you've gone out and had a chance to think a little bit differently about things, you think outside of the box. You can bring new and fresh ideas on how to deal with things. You're not stuck in older ways of thinking.

What are some areas in which you feel you can make a difference?
I have two main fields of interest. First, from a liberal economic ideology, I'm concentrating specifically on the cost of living, food prices in Israel.

There are many barriers and regulations on almost everything in the food industry, which makes it difficult for people to develop their businesses and to actually sell to customers. Customers are paying a very high price. Everything here is so heavily regulated, so I'm working on releasing a lot of these barriers and regulations in order to eventually create better pricing.

The second thing is the pollution from the Palestinian Authority – industrial sewage, carcinogenic chemicals, running free through Israel's rivers and ending up in the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea. Pollution doesn't recognize any borders.

During the Oslo accords, the Palestinians committed to build facilities to clean the water and to reuse water for agriculture. It's been more than 20 years, and they've actually received a lot of funds from the States and the European Union to build all these facilities, but they haven't done it. All this money has somehow disappeared, and we end up with the pollution.

Fish and wildlife, vegetation, it all suffers. Last year, there was three-metre high toxic foam running through the Alexander River, killing everything on its way. Israel's biggest water supply is under Judea and Samaria, a mountain aquifer. If toxic chemicals go into the groundwater there, it's going to be irreversible, and there's nothing we can do.

And they're using it against us. They take pictures of open sewage around cities and rivers, to tell the world "Look how we live." "Look at our polluted streets. It's all the fault of Israel" – another lie they're spreading to get donations to build recycling plants.

You've also been outspoken about marijuana legalization. Isn't medical marijuana already legal here?
You can get already get a prescription for medical cannabis, but it's a very long, very bureaucratic process, relying on committees and clerks to decide who's going to get it or not.

I've seen so many people who are suffering every single day. They're in pain, and committees in the Ministry of Health do not allow it. The system that every prescription has to go through the Ministry of Health is wrong. These decisions should be left in the hands of doctors and specialists. We allow doctors to treat patients with much harsher drugs. We should trust doctors to prescribe this medicine as well.

The second thing is the decriminalization of cannabis. As a modern country, we understand that when people are addicted to drugs, it's a disease. It's not a crime.

What do you think of Canada's recent election results?
I know that [former prime minister Stephen] Harper was a true friend to Israel. Loyalty is very important in the international community. I really hope that the new government will stay on the straight path and strengthen the connection and bond between the two countries. ■

Uriel Da Costa's path off the derech

Backstory

JONATHAN L. MILEVSKY

At the recent Agudath Israel convention in Stamford, Conn., the closing keynote speeches addressed the phenomenon of Jews going "off the derech" – that is, Jews who decide to become unaffiliated with Judaism. The tendency now among community leaders and outreach professionals appears to be to concentrate on preventative measures, putting an emphasis on the care that must be shown towards those at risk.

At the same time, there is less of an emphasis placed on addressing the philosophical and theological questions of those who break with the community on the basis of those concerns. Historically, however, those who went off the derech sometimes did so because of theological or philosophical reasons. Baruch Spinoza, who I would call the godfather (or natural father) of all who leave the Jewish faith, serves as an obvious example.

Regardless of the political situation in Amsterdam, where Spinoza lived, or the position that his views regarding the providence of God and the authorship of the Bible put the community in – and some argue that both of those factors may have forced the community's hand in the decision to excommunicate him – the systematic and comprehensive views Spinoza lays out in his Theological Political Treatise are not the thoughts of someone who would be able to live within the community.

Spinoza's predecessor (and possible influence), Uriel Da Costa, belonged to a Marrano family, and first converted to Judaism because he found theological difficulties in Christian doctrine. In somewhat similar fashion to Spinoza, Da Costa's first break with Judaism was also a matter of principle.

In fact, as Miriam Bodian, a professor of Jewish history, explains, it was based on his rejection of the oral law, which he believed stood in contradiction to the old law. Da Costa's claims, which he expressed in his Examination of Pharisaic Traditions (1623), were taken quite seriously by the Jewish community of Portugal, where he lived. Indeed, the community directed those concerns to the colourful sage Leon de Modena. Modena's response is recorded in his book, Magen Ve-zina.

Even so, Da Costa's first break with the Jewish community was only a partial one. He reconciled with the community in 1628, but not fully, since he still did not keep the dietary laws, and he was excommunicated again four years later. This time, the process of reconciliation was a long and humiliating one, and it took seven years until he was admitted again.

> Those who leave the faith sometimes do so for theological and philosophical grounds.

Nevertheless, in perhaps the clearest expression of how deeply he clung to his heterodox views, Da Costa took his own life not long afterwards. This interpretation is supported by the autobiography, entitled Explanation of a Life, found near his bed, in which he expresses faith in a God that cares only that humans ought to live moral lives.

As Tamar Rudavsky notes, in Explanation of a Life, one of Da Costa's main arguments is that rabbinic Judaism has no notion of natural law, the term for a universally valid, moral framework. Given that he originally studied canon law at the University of Coimbra, it not surprising that he thought in those terms. In fact, it is possible that Da Costa reflected on that issue for some time. In an earlier work, Examination of Pharisaic Traditions, he already mentions natural law, namely, in the way that the moral framework seems to be incompatible with a particular rabbinic ruling.

Rudavsky convincingly argues that Da Costa was wrong about natural law being incommensurable with rabbinic thought. Although the term natural law does not appear to be in use until it is found in the work of Joseph Albo in the 15th century, a similar idea was found in rabbinic, Gaonic, and medieval thought.

But whether Da Costa was right or wrong on that particular issue is beside the point. Despite our most serious efforts, those who go off the derech and leave the faith sometimes do so for theological and philosophical grounds. And in those cases, even our deepest expression of care may not be enough. ■

University entrance requirements becoming more holistic

Recent media coverage has focused on how universities are retooling their admissions procedures, including assessing applicants through standardized tests, personal references, and complex interview processes to measure students' critical thinking abilities. In an attempt to ascertain the overall suitability of a student for success in a program and future career, many universities have started to rate applicants more holistically, and not based solely on academic ability.

Twenty-five years ago, a brief essay and short interview could secure medical school admission. Today, a high GPA, an outstanding MCAT score, personal references, a rigorous interview and a résumé with diverse work and volunteer experiences doesn't always guarantee admission with more holistic admissions criteria. Admission to other professional programs, such as dentistry, law and business are equally as competitive.

While grades remain an important metric, they are only one piece of the admissions puzzle in working towards a chosen career path. Planning should begin as early as junior high. Students, as well as parents, should consider creating a plan for the student's future university studies.

Overall, universities are evaluating a student's longitudinal development. For example, if you volunteer in an organization in Grade 10, what is your longevity with that organization? Do you continue to volunteer over time and gradually take on roles with more responsibility? Do you grow and develop leadership skills? What is your progression? Being able to demonstrate commitment and growth in areas outside of academics are becoming increasingly important from a university admissions perspective.

University is a long-term investment. Bachelor degrees are still relevant and develop valuable critical thinking skills, providing the launching point for professional development.

Many university programs have moved to problem and case-based learning, providing a broad cross section of transferrable skills, with learning models that sometimes include internships and co-op placements to provide students with early exposure to future work environments. These placements also provide the opportunity to demonstrate personal value and expertise to potential employers, which can result in an offer of employment following the completion of a degree.

Dr. Robert Astroff, president of Astroff Consultants Inc.

How can students improve their application profile? Focus on talent, aptitude, areas of interest and passion. Volunteer and develop skills with respect to communication, time management and leadership. Pay attention to academics while taking advantage of the opportunity to develop critical thinking skills. These steps will help prepare a student to apply successfully for university admission, but most importantly, will develop them as a person. ■

Why a child's curiosity matters

It used to be that a child's aptitude was measured by their understanding of the 3R's. No longer. Today, the more advanced pedagogy says learning facts and figures is fine, but hardly a predictor of lifelong success. What is? Studies are now telling us that curiosity, creativity and, very importantly, perseverance are essential.

Introducing the world-renowned Reggio Emilia Early Childhood Education program at Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA). This year, they've revamped the JK-SK program based on this legendary approach to education. In 2016, they are beginning a nursery program with the same orientation.

Its history is an interesting one. In post-World War II Italy, the small town of Reggio Emilia recognized that children were the key to rebuilding their city. Education would be a pivotal component. So the community embarked on changing the way its children were taught, particularly in the early years. Half a century later, and based on years of research and evaluation, it has become astoundingly clear that a focus on play, imagination and self-expression build more adept and more advanced learners. The philosophy has become known as the Reggio Approach.

"The idea is to embrace children's natural curiosity," says Claire Sumerlus, head of school. "Children have an amazing ability to think critically, and we encourage them to ask questions and explore their environment. This inquiry produces learners who are able to analyze, hypothesize and come up with their own solutions. Amazingly, it all begins in the early years of a child's education."

The curriculum is structured in a special way. Students work in small groups so that each child is heard individually. Children collaborate to find answers to their own questions, teachers tailor lessons to fit the particular needs and interests of the class, and students' observations drive the conversations and activities. This happens across both general and Jewish studies.

Classrooms are designed to bring the outside environment in, and natural materials are used in the learning process. Each week, time is spent outdoors investigating and observing nature.

"On a recent excursion, the JK class was curious about why trees grow in different directions," says Sumerlus. "These questions led to discussions about the way in which sunlight and the environment affect the growth of trees and vegetation. The students then took their observations and explored them further in the classroom."

The Reggio Approach also places an emphasis on documenting the children's thoughts and the progression of their thinking. Teachers share the activities with parents so conversations can continue at home. "Gone are the days when your child says they don't remember what they learned at school. Each parent can see what happened at school that day through photos and videos," says Sumerlus.

"The end result is happy children who not only develop sharper and more sophisticated minds, but who also go through life thinking innovatively and originally." ■

New siddurim connect children to prayer

MAAYAN JAFFE
JNS.ORG

"Tfillah is a journey," says Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, former chief rabbi of the United Kingdom.

Some students are better able to experience that voyage with the release of the first two volumes in the Koren Magerman Educational Siddur Series, a joint project of Yeshiva University (YU) and Koren Publishers Jerusalem.

These two prayer books – The Koren Children's Siddur and the Koren Ani Tefilla Weekday Siddur for high school students – offer a new approach to tfillah education in the school, the home, and the synagogue.

The books, according to YU's Scott Goldberg, are based on dialogue with close to 100 elementary, middle, and high school Jewish educators.

Following a short trial period, during which YU and Koren received positive feedback from Jewish educators who reviewed them and tried them in their own classrooms, the books are now available to the general public.

In an introduction, publisher Matthew Miller conveys that the siddurim serve two purposes. One is the obvious: prayer. While volume 1 is abridged, the prayers follow traditional conventions. So too with the high school siddur, which is not abridged.

Giving children age-appropriate siddurim is a paradigm shift, says Daniel Rose, project director of The Koren Children's Siddur and author of the adult educational companion.

> You don't give [primary students] a high school math book ... so why do we give them an adult siddur?

"You don't give [primary students] a high school math book and say, 'You'll get something now, but by the time you get to high school you'll really get it.'... So why do we give them an adult siddur?" explains Rose.

Rose says he and his team are trying to encourage a new way of thinking about the prayer curriculum in Jewish day schools. Rather than the focus being on Hebrew literacy, tropes, and choreography, the new prayer books will help teachers (and parents) better help students connect to the prayers and their meanings on a spiritual level, according to Rose

In the children's siddur, this is accomplished through a combination of visually stimulating, detailed, and intentional designs coupled with creative use of trigger questions and quotes.

The siddur's creative director, Tani Bayer, describes the project as among the most unique she has participated in during her career as a graphic designer. She says she relates to the concept of the work on personal, parental, and educational levels.

"I grew up frum, and even to this day I would say there is something missing for me personally in my connection to tfillah," says Bayer, noting how "special" it is to know that such a tool is now available for her own children, and that she will be able to watch them grow up with the relationship and dialogue with God she wants them to have.

The high school version (which can be used by anyone in high school or older) stimulates an intellectual, visual, and emotional connection to prayer through Rabbi Sacks' translation of the prayers. It also includes a multi-tier commentary by Rabbi Jay Goldmintz.

"Each of us come to tfillah with different experiences and backgrounds, at different stages of our lives and our development... with different needs, moods and desires," writes Rabbi Goldmintz in his introduction to the high school siddur. "The prayer does not change, but the pray-er does." ■

Discovering selflessness during a gap year in Israel

CHANA DEVORAH LEVINE
JNS.ORG

I had looked forward to my year in seminary with great anticipation because I knew that living and learning in Israel would open up a whole new world to me. In fact, everyone I encountered informed me that my gap year would consist of one life-altering experience after another and that I needed to make the most of every opportunity that came my way.

But I was a little anxious about my ability to truly maximize the year. After all, I had only a few short months to achieve so many important things. In addition to increasing my Torah knowledge and enhancing my spirituality, I wanted to volunteer, to give of myself, and to make an impact on others. Even though an incredible opportunity to volunteer with special needs children fell into my lap, I wasn't sure if I could juggle everything.

To my great surprise, however, the volunteering opportunity was actually the best thing that could have happened to my year. It reframed and added structure to my seminary experience, and opened my eyes to the depth and beauty of life.

So what was this transformative volunteering program?

While serving as a counsellor last summer at Camp Migdal, a camp for children and teenagers with special needs, I was approached by the assistant director, Perri Binet, with a request. During her gap year many years earlier, Perri had started a unique volunteering initiative with ALEH, Israel's largest network of facilities for children with severe physical and cognitive disabilities, whereby seminary students would visit ALEH's Jerusalem facility every night to say the Shema prayer with the kids and put them to bed (like all other Jewish children). Perri was hoping that I would take over the "Sweet Dreams" program for the year.

At first, I didn't know what to say. I was concerned about how I could possibly fit this into my already packed schedule, and the added responsibility made me anxious. But the program touched my heart, and I happily agreed.

Thanks to my friends in different schools around Jerusalem, it didn't take too long to complete the weekly roster. Within just a few days, we solidified the rotation and began visiting the kids. Every night, the designated group of girls would spend 45 minutes going from room to room singing Shema and other lullabies and dispensing countless hugs and kisses.

I had slotted myself in for Thursday nights, and it quickly became the highlight of my week. Prior to my first visit to ALEH in Jerusalem, I wondered how responsive the children would be. As my relationships with the children grew from week to week, I revelled in their abilities to enjoy our time together –smiling, clapping and giggling from the moment we arrived until the moment they faded off to sleep.

Though our weekly visits were short, my interactions with the ALEH kids and staff impacted me tremendously. It was amazing to be surrounded by such warmth, to realize that every person who entered ALEH Jerusalem would be praised and appreciated both as individuals and for the great value that they added to the group, even if the value added was seemingly unconventional. It was inspiring to see that every accomplishment, no matter how small, would be celebrated as a major milestone.

> The volunteering opportunity ...opened my eyes to the depth and beauty of life.

It was this stunning new system for evaluating the world that transformed my year and, ultimately, my life. By design, there is a sense of "selfishness" that is built into the seminary experience. The year is all about the individual: her goals, her growth, and how much she hopes to gain from every experience. Thankfully, my time at ALEH kept me grounded, reminding me that while my personal growth was important, it would be flawed and incomplete if it wasn't rooted in selflessness and receiving by way of giving as much of oneself as possible.

I also reflect on how at the beginning of the year, I was so overwhelmed by my desire to achieve "everything" that I found myself paralyzed, with no idea of how or where to begin. But as I spent more and more time at ALEH, I learned that in order to achieve my goals, I would first need to redefine success and celebrate every step of my journey toward that goal –even the small ones – as a major victory.

All too often, it is the fear of failure that prevents us from accomplishing our goals. Yet if we only realized the value of a single action or experience, we would likely achieve a great deal more than we could ever imagine. Most of the time, all that stands between our greatest successes and our most dismal failures is the bravery to take (and celebrate) one step at a time.

In my case, a step toward the unknown allowed me to impact the lives of so many beautiful Jewish children and, in turn, provided me with the tools to not only maximize my year, but to elevate my outlook on life. A cause for celebration, indeed. ■

Scientific-technological preschool opens in Israel

ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
ISRAEL21C

Why did global aerospace giant Lockheed Martin send its chief executive to a Be'er Sheva preschool?

Because Lockheed Martin is a major partner in Israel's first science-technology preschool program, thus far serving 100 children ages three to five. The idea is that it's never too soon to inculcate the basics of science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) so as to better prepare the next generation for the job market.

"The future growth of Israel's economy will require a constant supply of highly trained, highly capable technical talent, which is why advancing STEM education is a critical focus for Lockheed Martin," said Marillyn Hewson, Lockheed Martin chair, president and CEO.

> The future growth of Israel's economy will require highly capable technical talent.

"We are proud of our collaboration with Israel's Ministry of Education, Ministry of Science and the Rashi Foundation to promote STEM-related programs for kindergarten through high school students," said Hewson at the dedication ceremony.

Lockheed Martin is among several major multinationals that have established offices in Be'er Sheva's new Gav-Yam Negev Advanced Technologies Park (ATP) housing mainly companies involved in developing cyber technologies.

The new early-childhood curriculum was designed to provide 300 hours of science study per year in a learning environment that allows preschoolers to develop skills through hands-on activities in astronomy, physics, chemistry and robotics.

Over the next three years, the classrooms taking part in the project will be equipped with computers, Lego construction kits, robotics experiments and space-related content, according to the Rashi Foundation. The joint initiative is part of the MadaKids program that aims to cultivate future scientists in Israel. ("Mada" means "science" in Hebrew.)

The project is operated by Beit Yatziv, an organization that runs science education programs for some 40,000 elementary school pupils across Israel on behalf of the Rashi Foundation, including a municipal science excellence centre in co-operation with the municipality of Be'er Sheva.

"The participating kindergarten teachers received special training at Beit Yatziv that focused on the science behind natural phenomena such as the seasons, astronomy, robotics and more," says Maya Lugassi Ben-Hemo, head of pedagogy at Beit Yatziv.

She emphasizes that the preschoolers won't lack time to enjoy traditional nursery-school activities.

"The science and technology program will be integrated within the regular curriculum of the Ministry of Education for science-oriented kindergartens," she tells ISRAEL21c. It is hoped that this model for technological preschool education will be duplicated across Israel.

Hewson was not the only big name on hand for the dedication of the science preschool. Also in attendance were Minister of Education Naftali Bennett, Be'er Sheva Mayor Rubik Danilovitch, Rashi Foundation chairman Lt. Gen. (ret.) Gabi Ashkenazi and other dignitaries from Israel and abroad.

"The significance of the knowledge the children gain in preschool will be felt in years to come, and it will surely be highly valuable on the personal as well as the national level," said Bennett. ■

Inspiration versus information

Our goal is to engage our students.
To build character.
To prepare them for success in life.

Our programs are designed to inspire each student to value:
- Effort and achievement in Torah and General Studies
- A connection to Hashem through daily Tefila
- A connection to their fellow man through Middot, Derech Eretz and Chesed
- A connection to their world through math, science and technology

Our programs include:
- Qualified, experienced, and professional caring staff
- Full day preschool through Junior High
- Enriched early years program
- French Studies Grades 1-8
- Extra-curricular programming

Three reasons why reading is important for children

NEWS CANADA

Despite the proliferation of high-tech mobile devices, tablets and laptops, the benefits of simply reading a book endure.

Fostering a love of reading among children has long-term payoffs. It teaches them new values and lessons, exercises concentration skills, and even helps them learn new vocabulary or different ways to phrase a thought.

The National Reading Campaign, organized by readers, writers, publishers, educators and others who are focused on creating a society of lifelong readers, reports some of the top reasons why reading is so important:

- Readers have better physical health, mental health and empathy.
- Reading for just six minutes can reduce stress by as much as 60 per cent, slow your heart beat, ease muscle tension and alter your state of mind.
- Reading has better stress-reduction outcomes than playing video games, drinking tea, listening to music or even going for a walk.

Reading is important on many levels. So teachers across the country work with innovative approaches to ensure every student is equipped with, not just reading skills, but a love of reading that will last a lifetime.

"As students get older, it can become more challenging to keep them engaged in reading," says a North Vancouver elementary teacher.

Providing realistic content helps. For high school students with learning disabilities, integrating familiar technology assists with repetition exercises to boost reading.

Not all teachers who want to implement this love of reading for their students have access to the resources and technology necessary to do so. To create a meaningful learning experience for their students, teachers can post their projects with MyClassNeeds, a charitable crowd-funding organization that supports publicly funded schools across Canada. ■

More information about the MyClassNeeds program and how Canadians can contribute to a widespread love of reading is available at www.myclassneeds.ca.

THE ACADEMY FOR GIFTED CHILDREN – P.A.C.E.
PRIVATE SCHOOL

The Academy for Gifted Children, P.A.C.E., is the only school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child, in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E., is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E. is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction and a more complex approach to learning.

A fully balanced school program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program.

A new chapter for engineering at York for 2016

What springs to mind when you think of York University? Engineering? Perhaps not.

What do you associate with engineering? Passion? Humanism? Unlikely.

What about the spaces for engineering studies? Bright? Inspiring? Probably not.

These things are changing at York in 2016.

The transformation comes from the Lassonde School of Engineering created less than four years ago by founding Dean Janusz Kozinski, backed by a $25-million donation from mining entrepreneur and philanthropist Pierre Lassonde.

The school offers a full spectrum of undergraduate programs – with civil, mechanical and electrical engineering added recently – together with computer science degrees and more.

It offers a different type of engineering education to prepare students for the rapidly changing world. Students, or Lassondians as they are known, can study a variety of subjects including entrepreneurial courses at the Schulich School of Business, and intellectual property classes at Osgoode Hall Law School. Lassonde has also committed to achieving a 50:50 gender split among students, the first engineering school in Canada with that goal.

"We will be a school that is recognized for its fascination with improving education, its humanistic breadth, its warmth, its human sympathy and its intense need to look at every angle of an issue," Kozinski said.

For the past two years, 25 students have attended a summer program at Technion-Israel Institute of Technology. The next cohort is being selected for the 2016 program, which includes a chance to visit startups and entrepreneurs in Israel. This year, plans are also underway for students to travel to Ethiopia for an international development program led by Technion's Engineers Without Borders chapter.

"Those three weeks in Israel were probably the best of my life so far… We learned some valuable lessons, and we formed some bonds that will last a lifetime," said Amal Dave, a Lassonde student who participated in the Technion program last year.

Another dramatic change for Lassonde's engineering students will come in 2016 with the opening of a brand new space that confronts all expectations of what an engineering building should look and feel like.

Opening in March, the Bergeron Centre for Engineering Excellence is already attracting global attention from design critics and architecture experts worldwide. It will be the new $115-million home to the students and faculty of Lassonde, with open-plan work areas, student-owned spaces and natural light streaming through the tessellated glass façade.

"The building has been designed to feel open and built just for us – they put in everything we need to do our studies so that we feel at home and valued… It's a beautiful building, and even the triangle-shaped glass in the design represents engineering well," said Lassonde space engineering student Tetiana Sitiugina.

The Bergeron Centre for Engineering Excellence represents a seismic shift in the way engineers are educated. Students can learn through practical problem-solving and team projects.

In the "flipped classroom" approach, students can watch lectures on their laptops wherever and whenever they wish, and then come to the Bergeron Centre to develop hands-on solutions to challenges, with the help of classmates and the guidance of professors. ■

Rabbi makes history again, and kippot get a boost in France

Another milestone for Kagedan

Canadian Rabbi Lila Kagedan, who was ordained last year by New York's Orthodox women's seminary Yeshivat Maharat and became its first graduate to use the title rabbi, will make history again when she starts work at the Mount Freedom Jewish Center in Randolph, N.J., later this month. In her new part-time role – the first for a female rabbi at an Orthodox shul – Rabbi Kagedan will join the spiritual leadership team, teaching and doing youth outreach. Mainstream Orthodox and haredi groups reject the idea of female rabbis. "Rabba" or "maharat" are the more common titles adopted by graduates of Yeshivat Maharat, which allows the women to choose what to be called.

Skullcaps on social media

A social media campaign hashtagged #TousAvecUneKippa asked people in France to wear kippot Jan. 15 after Marseille

French Jews are getting support on Twitter.

Jewish community leader Tzvi Amar urged Jews to remove them following a spate of stabbings in his southern French city. Jewish lawmaker Meyer Habib and non-Jewish colleague Claude Goasguen wore kippot in the National Assembly to protest Amar's idea, which was also rejected by other Jewish leaders and French President Francois Hollande, who said it was "intolerable" that Jews feel the need to hide their identities. Many Twitter users posted altered photos of Jewish and non-Jewish celebrities wearing skullcaps, while Chabad said rabbis would be handing out kippot across France. Since October, there have been three non-fatal stabbing attacks on Jews in Marseille, which has 80,000 Jews.

Siri speaks Lashon Hakodesh

Siri, Apple's voice-activated personal assistant, now speaks Hebrew. Hebrew Siri is part of a beta version of Apple's new iOS 9.3 operating system, which was released to developers Jan. 11. The general public will see it in about a month. Hebrew beta Siri doesn't support queries on Apple's navigation app, Maps, but can answer general questions. The version ultimately released to the public could have more features. Siri currently supports more than 30 languages. ■

The dilemma of Jewish terror

Like most Jews, I am saddened and shocked and horrified at the idea of Jewish terrorism, specifically the Duma attack resulting in the death of a toddler and his parents and the severe injury of a four-year-old child ("Police reveal full details behind July attack," Jan. 7).

In no way do I condone or excuse or accept such behaviour.

However, I can understand the sheer frustration and sense of helplessness that may lead to a misguided belief that murder of innocents is an option.

The situation in Israel is untenable where Israelis are murdered at random by car-wielding and knife-wielding murderers.

The sense of fear must be immense, exacerbated by the terror attack earlier this month in Tel Aviv. The government is not doing enough to stop the horror.

The world continues to blame Israel, even as Jews are being attacked and murdered. Is it any wonder that some Jews feel that they must take the law into their own hands?

It is not the solution, and nothing good can come of terrorism of any sort.

But unless there is a more concerted attempt by the Israeli government to end the current wave of terrorism, it is likely that some Jews may continue to fight the wrong of Arab terrorism with the wrong of Jewish terrorism, though even saying those words is an oxymoron.

Column disturbed

I am 78 years old, and I, along with many of your elder readership, found the column "Reflections on the final journey," (Jan. 7) in the worst possible taste.

I really did not need to know that there will be holes the size of golf balls at the bottom of my casket, letting in various bugs and flies, etc., to allow forensic entomologists, should they be interested, to tell exactly how long my body has been decomposing.

Jewish family services

In the article "JF&CS reaches out to Orthodox community," (Dec. 10), Toronto's Jewish Family and Child (JF&CS) is described as the "only Jewish child welfare agency mandated by the government in North America."

As the recently appointed director of communications at Jewish Child and Family Service in Winnipeg, I would like to take this opportunity to introduce you to our agency, which is also officially mandated by the province of Manitoba to provide child welfare services.

Our agency here in Winnipeg has an impact on over one-third of the Jewish community providing financial assistance to over 800 families including 500 children living under the poverty line and 20 children living in foster care.

Our agency is proud to be a part of the North American Association of Jewish Family & Children's Agencies (AJFCA) and a government mandated agency providing vital services to our local community.

I am hoping for less anti-Semitism, as well as peace in Israel!

RABBI-2-RABBI

Judaism in the age of Rabbi Google

Our 21st-century web-based reality has affected the way religion is studied and practised, but while the Internet can provide content, it can't provide physical community

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: Recently, a media marketing firm interviewed me for a segment they were producing about religion and the web. Just as our 21st-century web-based reality has impacted practically every area of human endeavour, it has affected the way religion is practised. From Googling halachic questions to Facebook conversations that refine opinions in the model of the beit midrash, a religiously engaged life looks different today than it did in the pre-Internet era.

What are some of the ways you have observed religious life being influenced by the Internet, and is there merit in waxing nostalgic for a less web-obsessed era?

Rabbi Cutler: There are a lot of wonderful websites filled with contemporary, relevant Jewish sources. Indeed, I often instruct young adults approaching the age of bar/bat mitzvah to consult Rabbi Google.

But while the Internet can provide content, it can't provide community.

Various attempts have been made at organizing minyans (especially for Kaddish) via the web. Many authorities, while applauding the ingenuity, nevertheless rule that a quorum cannot exist in the ethers of the Internet. Rather, it is physical presence that matters.

Online communities are not the same as physical communities. The recitation of Kol Nidrei in a filled room is not the same as live-streaming a Yom Kippur service. The personal shivah call is not the same as Skyping in. Facetiming a wedding isn't the same as actually dancing with the bride or groom.

How does your digital-free Shabbat compare with your plugged-in week?

Rabbi Scheier: I imagine this is the moment in history when traditional Shabbat observance least resembles our weekday realities. Instead of simply refraining from commerce and electricity and the like, we have added another area of observance: the withdrawal from our essential forms of communication, connection and study.

That being said, perhaps the contrast highlights the power that a community can offer. In a Facebook era where we count even remote acquaintances as "friends," the authentic friendships developed in community are even more treasured. In a Twitter age that values brevity of expression, deeper and more-developed thoughts might be more appreciated. And in a world where so much information is easily accessed by dint of a few keystrokes, how precious is the opportunity to ponder those deep questions about life, God and religion – questions to which Google has no satisfying answer!

Do you think that a digital era challenges Shabbat observance, or does it make Shabbat observance more satisfying?

Rabbi Cutler: As I often tell people, there are few things as satisfying as putting away my cellphone before Shabbat. I am less distracted. I spend less time thinking about my response to whatever I'm hearing or reading. I spend less time thinking about what I have to do next. I can actually think about what I am hearing. I can be present in the moment. Life without live-tweeting is a life much better lived.

What, though, of individuals who do not share our commitment to Halachah or understand it in a way that would not prohibit cellphone usage on Shabbat?

Certainly, many Jews bring their phones to shul. Sometimes they may be scrolling through Instagram. Other times they may want to keep tabs on a sick child or parent. While cellphone usage in the sanctuary may be inappropriate for a variety of reasons, what about the foyer or during kiddush?

I am a proponent of meeting Jews where they are. I don't think it is our place, as rabbis, to judge. Yet, in the sacred space of the synagogue building, I think it is wholly appropriate to ask people to put away their phones on Shabbat.

In an individually oriented society, we too often fail to sublimate our personal desires for communal norms. There are moments – and I believe that being in shul on Shabbat is one of those moments – when we should give-up personal desires in order to be fully part of something greater than ourselves. This is an expression of communal and religious solidarity, as well as an indication that one can transcend the self in a web-obsessed world that preaches personal happiness as the ultimate virtue. ■

Amid terror, anti-Semitism, a lesson from the Holocaust

In a new book excerpted in this week's CJN, historian Michael R. Marrus argues that the Holocaust cannot teach us any formulaic lessons. The Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe professor emeritus of Holocaust studies at the University of Toronto suggests instead that the lessons of the Holocaust are constantly in flux, and open to interpretation and reinterpretation. "I contest the idea that there exist some formulae that constitute lessons of the Holocaust – or even worse, the lessons of the Holocaust," he writes in Lessons of the Holocaust. "In a nutshell, the problem with such lessons is that, unfortunately, history does not speak to the present with so clear an admonitory voice."

Perhaps not, but the events of the last few days might suggest otherwise.

Over the weekend, the United States lifted sanctions against Iran, after concluding that the Islamic Republic had complied with the terms of a nuclear deal reached last July. Overseas assets frozen for years – as much as $100 billion worth – will now be available to Tehran. The European Union also cancelled its oil embargo of Iran.

How Iran plans to spend this windfall is a matter of great speculation. Perhaps, as many who support the nuclear deal hope, it will focus on modernization and purchasing the goods that the Iranian people have gone without for many years. Or maybe, the deal's detractors argue, the money will finance more weapons and fighters to be used against Iran's enemies, to fund Syria's brutal civil war and bankroll terror organizations in the region. Israel and Jews around the world are praying for the former, while planning for the latter.

Elsewhere, in recent days, a terrorist inspired by Islamic State (ISIS) used a machete to attack a Jewish teacher in the French city of Marseille, just two months after another Jewish teacher was stabbed by ISIS supporters north of the city. In response, one local Jewish leader suggested that Marseille's Jewish men should stop wearing kippot in public. And while other leaders, including the French president, were quick to reject that idea and lend their support to the embattled Jewish community, this latest incident again casts doubt on the future of French Jews, a record 8,000 of whom immigrated to Israel in 2015.

Then, late Sunday night in Israel, a Palestinian terrorist murdered Dafna Meir in her West Bank home. Meir, a nurse and premarital counsellor, fought her attacker, saving the lives of three children who were in the house at the time. She "was a happy woman, joyful, optimistic, driven, responsible, loving," one of her neighbours said. "She was always looking for how to help," a friend added.

Seventy years after the end of the Shoah, the danger facing the Jewish People may not be the same as that of 1930s Germany. But as the events of last week show, the threat is real, and so is the fear that there are insane, powerful entities out there who will not stop until Israel and the Jewish People are destroyed. That's why the most important lesson of the Holocaust, one that can be distilled down to two simple worlds, is as applicable today as ever before. Never again. ■ — YONI

George Jonas: A consummate outsider

Editor's Note: George Jonas passed away last week at the age of 80. The article below first appeared in the Jan. 26, 2006 edition of The Canadian Jewish News.

Shlomo Schwartzberg

Everything old is new again.

That expression has gained renewed cachet with the 2005 rerelease of George Jonas' Vengeance (Simon & Schuster), the 1984 book that is the basis for Steven Spielberg's controversial film Munich.

Jonas' equally controversial book, which tells the dramatic story of the Israeli Mossad's hunting down of the Palestinian terrorists responsible for the massacre of 11 Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, made a clear moral distinction between terrorism and counterterrorism. The $70 million Hollywood movie, by many accounts, does not, adding a key scene that offers up the Palestinian point of view and others in which the Mossad agents engage in constant questioning of their mission.

Sitting in the lobby café of a local hotel, Jonas seems almost bemused about the furor over the film adaptation. "The interesting thing is that the film actually is quite faithful, perhaps slightly more faithful, to the letter of the book than I would have been had I made a film of it. What it is not faithful to is the fundamental spirit of the book," says Jonas.

In a recent Maclean's magazine cover story, Jonas wrote: "The book has no trouble telling an act of war from a war crime; the film finds it difficult. Spielberg's movie worries about the moral trap of resisting terror; my book worries about the moral trap of not resisting it." Fortunately, Jonas says, "There have been a handful of reviewers, in the New York Times, the Weekly Standard, who actually bothered reading the book before making comparisons between the movie and the book. [They] saw the fundamental difference between the conclusions of the book and the conclusions of the film"

However, most journalists, whether defending or attacking Spielberg's film, have also taken a swipe at Jonas' book, deeming it inaccurate or saying its veracity has been called into question, specifically concerning the "existence" of the Mossad team leader, Avner.

"Personally… like every writer, I would be happier if there were no suggestion about the book's research lacking or being in any way in doubt," Jonas says. "I feel quite comfortable about my research [for the book]."

Malcolm Lester, whose then-company Lester & Orpen Dennys co-published the book in 1984, stands by the book's truthfulness, as well, provocatively adding that many of the broadsides against it "may come from the Mossad who want to create disinformation.

"I can only guess that," he added, pointing out that when Vengeance first appeared Israel's spy agency denied even engaging in targeted assassinations. ("Today," says Jonas, "you see examples of counterterrorism on television, on CNN news; you see an Israeli missile launched to strike a terrorist enclosure on the West Bank.")

Lester also met Avner and says, "I have no doubt that Avner at one level is who he says he was; whether all the details [he gives] are true… [But] I think George got at the truth of what was going on."

Controversy is nothing new to the Hungarian-born Jonas, who still exudes a gentle old-world European charm, despite having spent most of his life in Canada. (He emigrated from Hungary after the Soviet-quashed 1956 uprising.) His strong opinions, such as those decrying Communist holocausts as comparable to the Shoah, have been manifest in his columns for the

George Jonas

National Post, which he's been writing since the newspaper's inception in 1998, and in his syndicated newspaper columns, which date back to the mid-'90s.

Jonas was the writer/ producer/ director of the award-winning The Scales of Justice, dramatizations of landmark and interesting judicial cases that Jonas did for both CBC radio and television from 1981 to '96. David Cronenberg directed a TV segment of the show in 1990 when he was in between movies.

Despite his success as a writer/ producer/ director, and for the last 20-plus years as a freelancer, Jonas has always felt like an outsider. He tells the story of when he parked cars for the members of Toronto's tony Granite Club. "A Granite Club member couldn't place my accent and he said, 'let the Martian park my car.' In many ways, he was accurate.

"I was always a bit of a Martian in any group. I did not fully belong to any group that I nominally was a member of, whether it was fellow writers, fellow Hungarians or fellow Canadians or fellow Jews or fellow lyric poets or fellow motorcycle racers. I was never quite at home [with them], so in that sense I was a bit of an outsider."

That's a description that many writers and artists would embrace, he adds. "If you were to ask me a question, do I belong to a group called outsiders, the answer may be yes."

Politically, Jonas is often perceived as a right-winger. He disputes that label. "I do not see myself as a libertarian. I certainly don't see myself as a neo-conservative. I see myself as a classical liberal. My political views I derive from 19th-century liberalism, [from] John Stuart Mill, the kind of liberalism derived from the Scottish philosophers, not from the French revolution." It's a liberalism that he regards "as an organic property of existence, not a gift of the state."

He refers to the late John F. Kennedy's famous dictum, "Ask not what your country can do for you but what you can do for your country." "I would have some difficulties with that," says Jonas. "I believe that it's the country that exists for its individuals, for its people, rather than the individual for the country."

Those views come into contentious play today. "9/11 has awakened people to one danger, the danger of international terrorism, a certain totalitarian streak of Muslim theocracies," he stresses. "But in another sense, it's increased the aspect of statism in many areas, in the name of security. It's not because [the need for security] is not real, but it can serve as an excuse for that all-encroaching state to interfere with more and more aspects of your existence and develop more and more control over your life as an individual, on the basis that it's doing it for your own security. The paternalism of the state has been increased."

If so, it's a safe bet that Jonas will continue to sound the warnings against that paternalism and all the other pernicious ideologies that he fears affect us all. ■

For historians, the Shoah presents a conundrum

In an excerpt from his new book, MICHAEL MARRUS argues that the Holocaust may not direct us how to solve the problems of our time

Just over half a century ago, in family libraries throughout the English-speaking world, one could probably find, alongside the Bible, a dictionary, and a few other books, an 11-volume set by a couple, Will and Ariel Durant, entitled The Story of Civilization.

Somewhat anodyne by present-day tastes, their work presented a celebratory account of the human past. The Durants' history, although never completed (they both died in the 1980s), was a triumph of middlebrow culture of the day, written between 1935 and 1975 in some four million words and covering over 10,000 pages. These books arrived regularly into millions of households via the Book-of-the-Month Club, which included volumes as an inducement to join, and thereby put 13 million copies into print. The Durants' work became a landmark of accessibility, eventually publishing some 17 million copies. Recognized by the Pulitzer Prize (1968) and the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1977), the couple achieved great acclaim as masters of a huge panorama of popular history.

Similarly admired was a little volume by the Durants called The Lessons of History, published in 1968. Echoing the theme of their larger work, this book was upbeat. Things were improving, despite occasional setbacks. Like The Story of Civilization, The Lessons of History had absolutely nothing to say about the Holocaust, the persecution and murder of European Jewry during the time of Hitler's Third Reich. Indeed, there was nothing in The Lessons of History about Nazism. Nor, so far as I can tell, did anyone ever complain about this omission of what is now considered one of the most important historical events of recent centuries. And nor, so far as I know, did Will Durant's wife and co-author, Ariel, née Chaya Kaufman, from a Jewish family from Proskurov in western Ukraine and the granddaughter of a Torah scholar, ever make the case for the inclusion of these terrible events of modern history.

The Durants and their oversight suggest that the lessons of the Holocaust, and indeed much else of what we deem to be important in history, are not settled matters, as most people might think, but are rather the object of perceptions that differ and that change. Moreover, while opposing views flourish over what to include, contestation is, if anything, even more vigorous when it comes to the lessons of history.

While these lessons are constantly mentioned in popular discourse, historians generally avoid the issue as an embarrassment, out of keeping with their professional standing. Indeed, the more expert the historians, the more respected they are in their craft, the less disposed they are to proclaim lessons of history with any confidence. Put differently, historians and others who know their subjects well are likely to be far more skeptical than lay persons or popularists about the lessons of history – and whether such lessons even exist.

Over the course of some 35 years of reading, writing, and teaching the history of the Holocaust, I have contended with the questions that the Durants omitted – what we can learn from the history of the Holocaust. Although the topic of "the lessons of history" has gone somewhat out of fashion, reference to the lessons of the Holocaust is ubiquitous. Unsurprisingly, perhaps. After all, it is about unprecedented horrors: the brutalization of men, women, and children across Europe, in a sinister racially inspired scheme of wiping millions of Jews off the face of the earth.

What should all of this say to us, now that we have had time to reflect and research, over the passage of time? What should we take away, not only about the events, but about the killers, those immediately responsible, and also those who directed, who facilitated, who helped, who stood by – and for that matter the victims themselves, coming from so many different Jewish cultures, rich and poor, young and old, sick and well, believers and non-believers, scattered across an entire continent in their great diversity?

It is hardly surprising that so many expect that specific lessons should emerge from exposure to the massacre of European Jewry during World War II, and that studying this catastrophe should make these lessons explicit. We hear all the time about these lessons of the Holocaust in public pronouncements by dignitaries and in commemorations and educational contexts. More often than not these are part of public advocacy – as in, for example, "We should heed the lessons of the Holocaust" or "We must not ignore the lessons of the Holocaust" – rather than historical analysis.

Despite weak dollar, Canadians still planning Israel trips

lsarick@thecjn.ca

Canadian travellers may get sticker shock when they look at tours priced in U.S. dollars, but despite our own anemic dollar, tourism to Israel remains surprisingly strong, tour operators say.

With the Canadian dollar hovering around 70 cents and not expected to bounce back any time soon, Israel trips, generally priced in U.S. dollars have become considerably more expensive.

But despite the additional costs, bookings for the summer of 2016 "look fantastic," said Ehud Telem, president and CEO of Peerless Travel Group, which takes between 9,000 and 10,000 people to Israel annually.

Bookings are down slightly right now, but it's driven by concerns about the security situation in Israel more than the weak dollar, Telem said.

Youth movements, which run numerous trips for teenagers in the summer, also say the number of young people going on Israel trips this summer has remained stable, despite the fact that trips priced in U.S. dollars cost more for Canadian parents.

"Those people who grow up in Bnei Akiva, even though it may be financially difficult, they prioritize it," said Jonny Lipczer, director of Bnei Akiva Toronto, a religious Zionist youth movement.

So far, 20 Canadian teens have signed up for the summer trip, slightly more than last year, which will cost $7,300 (US).

Because applications for subsidies are handled confidentially, Lipczer did not know if more families were seeking scholarships, but he has helped families find cheaper flights.

Camp Ramah, part of the Conservative movement, is offering a $1,000 (US) discount to Canadians to bring down the cost of their summer Israel trip, which is $9,580 (US).

A discount of $1,500 was offered to Canadians who enrolled in the movement's high school semester in Israel, said registrar Judy Greene. So far, the same number of Canadians have signed up for the Israel trip as in previous years.

The low Canadian dollar is actually boosting attendance for NCSY trips, which are the cheapest Israel youth trips available, said Rabbi Leib Irons, director of education for NCSY Canada, the modern Orthodox youth movement. Families who were considering more expensive trips are now looking at NCSY's heavily subsidized trips, the least expensive of which cost about $3,500 (US).

About 200 Canadian youths are expected to go to Israel this summer, an increase from previous years, Rabbi Irons said.

Discounts were offered to students who signed up early or who attend Torah High, the after-school educational program.

"We have many, many private donors who subsidize it," Rabbi Irons said. Because the program requires teens to attend educational sessions before and after the trip, donors feel it's a productive investment in Jewish identity, he said.

Tommy Bacher, president of Maccabi Canada, is going to be looking for generous donors to cover the increased costs of the 2017 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

While the final trip price is still being worked out, the low Canadian dollar will add about $2,500 to the cost. Bacher worries the higher price will discourage athletes from even trying out for teams.

"We don't want this to be the games for people who can afford it," he said. "We want to take the best athletes in the country, irrespective of their financial situation."

The organization will be fundraising to help bring the price down, but Bacher said he anticipates the 2017 delegation will be smaller than in previous years.

But adult travel, which is usually not subsidized, remains strong.

El Al's bookings for the next three months are up, said Dinah Kutner, the airline's general manager in Canada.

Airfares have remained relatively stable, and there are deals to be had in Israel, if one looks carefully.

"A lot of tour operators are very sensitive to the fact the dollar has been devalued. They're trying to be creative and competitive. There have been some amazing packages offered by different hotel chains," she said.

Trips offered by Jewish federations are also fully subscribed. An adult March of the Living, which will travel to Poland and Israel this spring, has 70 adults, the same number as last year, each paying almost $9,000 (US), while the youth program has 250 participants, the same number as in previous years.

In Montreal, there's still a year and a half to go before the departure of CJA Federation's Mega Mission, and the price could rise from the advertised $4,500 (US), depending on the strength of the dollar. However, nearly 200 participants have already signed up, four times the number compared to the same period for the 2014 mission, said Yair Szlak, chief development officer of Federation CJA. ■

Trudeau should learn from Clinton, Moynihan and Cotler

Gil Troy

Those seeking a morally centred and reality-based Canadian foreign policy worry about what path Prime Minister Justin Trudeau will follow. Trudeau disdains former prime minister Stephen Harper's muscular, moralistic foreign policy. But Trudeau shouldn't lead Canada back to the morally blind days of liberal (and Liberal) "evenhandedness" that so worshipped the United Nations and so feared confronting any international organizations. Canada's approach should be anchored in democratic values, intolerant of international evil and tempered by a realistic assessment of Canadian reach. Trudeau's foreign policy guru, Roland Paris, once denounced "Canada's decade of diplomatic darkness." The response should not be a return to Canada's decade and a half of moral idiocy.

It's tempting for Trudeau to be the un-Harper. But beware the mess U.S. President Barack Obama made by trying to be the un-George W. Bush. In today's messy, menacing world, overreacting to heavy-handed, overly moralistic overreach with amoral appeasement helps nobody. Obama's weakness emboldened ISIS, the Iranians, the Syrians, the North Koreans and Vladimir Putin's Russian hooligans.

Trudeau should learn key foreign policy lessons from three leading liberals: former U.S president Bill Clinton, former U.S. senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan and former Canadian justice minister, Irwin Cotler. Canadian foreign policy should remain moral, muscular, meaningful, and respectful of the good the UN, NGOs and the current international infrastructure can accomplish, while skeptical of the evils too much of the global community tolerates, and even encourages.

Coming into office with little foreign policy experience and a Vietnam-era skepticism about U.S. power and righteousness, Clinton was originally too passive. He didn't defend U.S. interests effectively in Somalia and Haiti, and he violated core American and international ideals by standing idly by during the Rwandan genocide.

Clinton learned from Rwanda: the international arena abhors a vacuum. When democratic countries, including Canada, but especially the United States, dodge active leadership there, evil can flourish. Clinton became a liberal interventionist after Rwanda, leading aggressively against Saddam Hussein in Iraq and Slobodan Milosevic, the "Butcher of the Balkans," because no one else would.

Moynihan taught an important lesson as U.S. ambassador to the UN in the mid-1970s. He showed that sometimes, blasting the UN shows respect for it. His passionate fight against the UN and the global community's appeasement of dictators such as Idi Amin, against their worship of terrorists like PLO leader Yasser Arafat and against their demonization of democratic countries like Israel convinced many that Moynihan hated the UN. The United Nations Association even broke tradition and didn't make him its honorary chair when he left the UN.

Moynihan scoffed, noting that these fools didn't realize that he fought so hard against the UN's emergence as the Third World dictators' debating society precisely because he believed so deeply in the UN's great potential. Trudeau must remember that pushing for UN reform can be a compliment, not a mark of contempt.

Ultimately, Trudeau should learn from Cotler how to fight for human rights, uphold Canadian values and embody the quest for democracy worldwide without losing your soul. Cotler is neither a Harperite nor a Chrétienian. Wherever he has seen injustice, be it at a UN anti-Zionism conference in Durban, South Africa, or in President Bashar Assad's chemical gassing of his fellow Syrians, he's championed the moral response, the proportionate response, the Canadian response.

Cotler isn't a sabre-rattler, nor is he a pacifist. He's taught generations of Canadians the essential lesson that Clinton and Moynihan mastered and Trudeau must now learn: defending Canada, which includes pursuing justice whenever possible, requires a clear moral vision, a realistic appreciation of what can be accomplished and a broad arsenal of tools – some peaceful, other not. Because if the good people are the world are too passive, too relativistic or too silent, the bad guys win. ■

Are trees like us?

Sara Horowitz

It's easier than you would think to anthropomorphize trees – to imagine them as people. Branches become stout arms ending in lacy fingers, trunks become torsos, and facial features pop out of twists and knots of bark. Trees suffer in drought, lap up the rains, sap moving through them like lifeblood. They bear wounds and scars from disease and assaults. They silently witness our loves and our losses.

There is an ethical push in anthropomorphism. When we imagine that something is like us, we create a pocket of empathy. Its well-being comes to matter to us, and its suffering pains us. We become answerable for its welfare. But there's also an ethical pitfall to anthropomorphism – to imagining that everything is just like us. By projecting ourselves onto another, we stop paying attention to how that other is very much unlike us. We stop thinking about what it might require and desire, because we imagine it needs and wants exactly what we do.

A popular, if controversial, children's book from the mid-1960s imagined a boy and a tree in a lifelong relationship. At each stage, the boy desired something that the tree provided. Over time, granting the boy's desires took more and more out of the tree. From a branch for a swing and fruit to eat, the tree offered itself for agri-business, building materials, and eventually, a stump for the elderly former-boy to sit on. The book gives the tree human emotion and volition, repeatedly pronouncing it "happy" to serve. The tree's self-effacing joy has been read as a model for a "giving" spirit. The book has also been read as a manual for thoughtless exploitation – of nature, mothers or others. The emotions projected onto the tree allow us to imagine it gains fulfilment.

Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of Trees, reminds us that Judaism puzzles over whether and how trees might be like us, or we like them. Biblical laws concerning warfare, for example, lay out an ethical obligation to the natural world even under duress, focusing on the cutting down of trees during battle. In besieging a city, we read, "you must not destroy its trees, wielding the ax against them. You may eat of them, but you must not cut them down. Are trees of the field human to withdraw before you under siege?" (Deuteronomy 20:19, JPS translation). In the predominant reading of this passage, it's precisely because trees are not like us that we have an obligation to them. There's a poignancy to the helplessness of trees, literally rooted in their spot, unable to escape human assault. Unlike us, trees have no option to escape, to surrender, or to fight back and defend.

But there is a tension in the passage between letting nature be and using it – even using it up. The passage continues: "Only trees that you know to not yield food may be destroyed; you may cut them down for constructing siege works against the city that is waging war on you, until it has been destroyed." (Deut. 20:20). In other words, we spare at least some trees because we need them. Trees, in their "tree-ness," are neutral. Their fruit feed all parties – conquered and conqueror alike. And they may be used by all sides to wage war.

Most English translations render the phrase "ki ha'adam etz hasadeh" as a question: "Are trees of the field human?" – implying that they are not. But a few translations pick up on ambivalence of the Hebrew phrasing and translate it as an assertion that trees are, indeed, like humans, and we, like them – a metaphor we find elsewhere in the Tanach.

Hovering behind the image of trees in the field that may or may not be spared, I imagine the people in the city under siege. When you eat a tree's fruit, it keeps on giving. When you use it to wage war, it gets used up. ■

Why Jews will continue to support the Tories

Michael Taube

Not long after the Tories were defeated in last year's federal election, some pundits started to speculate that Canada would experience a long-term political shift.

What would this entail? The pundits didn't know for sure. Yet their magical crystal balls of (ahem) wisdom suggested a significant realignment of policies, ideas, individuals and groups.

Jews could certainly be included in the mix.

The two Jewish Tory MPs, Joe Oliver and Mark Adler, both lost their seats. All seven Jewish MPs in the current Parliament are Liberals. Former prime minister Stephen Harper, a strong supporter of Israel, stepped down as Tory leader. And while an informal Canadian Jewish News poll held Sept. 25 to Oct. 7, 2015, showed Jewish support at 44 per cent Tory, 40 per cent Liberal and 14 per cent NDP, exit polls – when they're released – could show different results.

This is the scenario some Canadian Jews desperately want to see. They can keep on dreaming in technicolour, because it ain't going to happen.

Jewish political and economic views have changed, improved and, quite frankly, grown up in recent years. This community's historical infatuation with the political left is over. While support will obviously shift from election to election, no political party can claim that it has a monopoly on Jewish voters.

Interestingly, a similar discussion about Jews occurred a few years ago, not in Canada, but in the United States.

It happened just after former Republican house leader Eric Cantor's stunning loss in his Virginia primary battle against David Brat in June 2014. Some publications played up the fact that the only Jewish Republican in both houses of Congress had been sent packing.

The New York Times reported David Wasserman's inference that Cantor was "culturally out of step with a redrawn district that was more rural, more gun-oriented and more conservative." Wasserman, who works for the Cook Political Report, directly said, "Part of this plays into his religion. You can't ignore the elephant in the room."

The Huffington Post went even further. It noted Cantor's defeat left "congressional Republicans without a non-Christian member," since he was "the second-ranking House Republican and highest-ranking Jewish member."

It wasn't not too hard to figure out the underlying message. Moderate-thinking Jews may not have a home in the GOP any longer if someone like Cantor couldn't survive the wrath of conservative Republicans and Tea Party activists.

The whole argument was ridiculous.

Cantor had a 23-year political career in a state with a population that's about one per cent Jewish. Virginia's 7th District, which has always been primarily rural and Christian, clearly didn't have a problem with a religious Jew as its representative, either.

Cantor was also, for the most part, a centre-right Republican. He's pro-free trade and a strong supporter of capitalism. He's opposed to gun control and had an "A" rating from the National Rifle Association. He's pro-life (100 per cent rating by the National Right to Life Committee) and opposed to gay marriage.

As well, Cantor didn't lose his Republican primary because he was Jewish. He lost because he ran a poor campaign.

The Washington Post reported on June 6, 2014, that he was leading 62 per cent to 28 per cent against Brat, based on an "internal survey of 400 likely Republican primary voters." By most accounts, Cantor took his big lead for granted and assumed he would win. As CNN Politics executive director Mark Preston mentioned, "this is a perfect example of somebody here in Washington who has gotten a little bit lazy and they didn't act quick enough to win their primary."

Fortunately, there were other Jewish Republicans in U.S. politics. One of them, New York's Lee Zeldin, was elected to the House of Representatives that very year.

American Jewish Republicans are, therefore, on the road to recovery. Their Canadian Tory cousins will soon join them. A small political setback doesn't lead to a massive political earthquake, folks. ■

The genocides are different, but the pain is the same

Bernie Farber

You could hear a pin drop. The silence accentuated the muffled cries and spilling tears as Justice Murray Sinclair Chair of Canada's Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) presented its final report Dec. 15.

Standing on a stage in the cavernous Ottawa Congress Centre beneath a banner reading, "For the child taken, for the parent left behind," Justice Murray Sinclair delivered a report consisting of some 3,231 pages.

It was at once historic and devastating. The report detailed the horrendous abuse suffered by indigenous children in residential schools after being kidnapped from their homes by federal government "Indian agents" and placed in strange, unwelcoming surroundings where hunger, sexual exploitation and even death became their tragic watchwords.

On the stage were two empty chairs in memory of perhaps up to 6,000 indigenous children for whom a residential school became their final resting place.

In a moment of absolute anguish, Sinclair asked all residential school survivors and their families to stand. He then addressed them directly: "We did this, after all, for those who were there and for those who were with us. We did this for the children who were taken away and for the parents who were left behind to cry for them. We did this for the children of today who needed to know when and what and why things occurred, so they could understand their lives."

The report itself is sharp and damning in its denunciations.

"Many students who went to residential school never returned… They were lost to their families. They died at rates that were far higher than those experienced by the general school-aged population. Their parents were often uninformed of their sickness and death. They were buried away from their families in long-neglected graves. No one took care to count how many died or to record where they were buried," the final report stated.

But mostly that day in Ottawa, we cried for the children.

> The tears that were running down our cheeks came from the same well of sadness and misery.

As Jews, you will understand.

Sitting in the Ottawa Congress Centre, I was reminded of another time in this very same place 30 years ago. I sat perhaps in the same row with my late father, Max, at the first "Gathering of Canadian Holocaust Survivors and their Children." The pain I felt that day in 1985 was precisely the same pain I was feeling this day in 2015. The tears that were running down our cheeks came from the same well of sadness and misery.

It never really occurred to me before that while the tragedies were different in scope and numbers, the pain of these two genocides was very much the same. Indeed, whether it was the Armenian genocide, the Rwandan genocide or others, the pain is a living, felt experience. The loss of a generation of children at the hands of a power and authority, though different in expression, ends up in that same pit of darkness for the survivors.

The TRC found, quite rightly, that Canada engaged in what it termed a "cultural genocide" against its First Nations people. I know that many Canadians found such a charge hard to accept. However, accept it we must. A popular Holocaust teaching curriculum that helps other countries come to grips with their own responsibilities and faults during the Shoah is called "Facing History and Ourselves." Surely it is time here in Canada that we, too, face our historical culpability in order to truly begin the healing process on the road to reconciliation.

On the final pages of the TRC report, residential school survivor Chief Robert Joseph said: "Reconciliation includes anyone with an open heart and an open mind who is willing to look to the future in a new way. Let us find a way to belong to this time and place together. Our future, and the well-being of all our children, rests with the kind of relationships we build today."

Indeed, words for all of us to live by. ■

Protesters disrupt U of T 'Palestinian resistance' event

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Roughly a dozen protesters associated with the Jewish Defence League of Canada loudly disrupted – and temporarily halted – a panel discussion Jan. 12 at the University of Toronto titled "Palestinian Popular Resistance: Building the Student Movement."

The protesters, a few of them wearing clothing marked with the JDL logo, sat scattered throughout the audience in the auditorium in U of T's George Ignatieff Theatre building and, part way through the first speaker's talk, several of them, including JDL Canada director Meir Weinstein, began shouting things like, "How many Jews do you want to kill?" "Terrorism" and "Anti-Semitism."

The event moderator said she would apply a "three strike" system – meaning that after three outbursts, anyone interrupting the talk would be asked to leave – but none of the protesters complied with numerous requests to vacate the room, and the organizers eventually called a recess and cleared out the auditorium.

At that point, most of the protesters lingered outside the theatre building for a bit before heading home, while the bulk of the audience relocated to the OISE building on Bloor Street to finish the lecture.

According to its Facebook invitation, the purpose of the event, which was hosted by the U of T Graduate Students' Union's (GSU) boycott, divestment and sanctions committee and endorsed by the Students Against Israeli Apartheid group at U of T, was to inform attendees about "what is currently taking place on the ground in Palestine and what we can do on our campuses to support and continue building the Palestinian popular resistance movement."

The panel featured, via Skype, Noura Erakat, a human rights attorney, assistant professor at Virginia's George Mason University and a former national grassroots organizer and legal advocate at the U.S. Campaign to End the Israeli Occupation, and, in person, Nada Elia, a member of the organizing committee of the U.S. Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel, founding member of the Radical Arab Women's Activist Network and a former representative to the United Nations of the Arab Women's Solidarity Association.

The JDL posted a call on its website Jan. 6 to attend the event to "confront and expose calls to murder Jews at U of T," adding that "the word 'resistance' is a code word for murdering Jews."

JDL member Liam Cohen, left, and JDL Canada director Meir Weinstein stand outside the George Ignatieff Theatre after the group's protest led an anti-Israel panel to switch venues.

"What I heard tonight was a total justification for murdering Jews," Weinstein told The CJN after the lecture had moved locations. "It's unfortunate that this is happening on a university campus. Students are being indoctrinated to hate Israel and Jews, and [these groups] are giving full justification for what's been called the 'knife intifadah.'"

He spoke in reference to Erakat's talk before it was cut short, which touched on issues such as Jewish settlers taking over Palestinians' homes and the Israeli government placing restrictions on the movements of Palestinians in Israel and the West Bank.

Erakat also showed a clip of the so-called "wedding of hate" – the now infamous video showing young religious men at a Jerusalem wedding celebrating the firebombing attack on a home in the Palestinian village of Duma in July.

She noted, "I should mention that the Israeli government has roundly condemned this video… yet they continue to let settlers act with impunity."

Elia, who only spoke briefly before protesters interrupted her, said she'd read about the JDL's planned protest of the event and declared, "Anyone who is here to object to calls to murder Jews, you're wasting your time. But you can be here to gain from learning that BDS is not about calls for the murder of Jews, but for the liberation of the people of Palestine."

Although a number of U of T campus police officers were present outside the doors of the auditorium, none got involved during the verbal altercation between protesters and event organizers.

On Jan. 7, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) sent out an email to its supports expressing concern about the event, writing, "For many Palestinians, the term 'popular resistance' – particularly in the current context – means acts of violence against Israelis. The use of this term by event organizers can reasonably be construed to endorse the current wave of Palestinian terror attacks."

> The term 'popular resistance'… means acts of violence against Israelis

CIJA could not be reached for comment.

Shira Gelkopf, U of T's Hillel co-ordinator, said Hillel sent a staff member to "monitor the event," but stressed it and the JDL had no communication prior to or during the event.

She noted that Hillel submitted a formal complaint to the university's vice-provost and urged the administration to ensure campus security was present.

A U of T spokesperson told The CJN that event organizers were informed they must comply with all university policies and ensure civil dialogue, and that campus police would be present.

The organizers could not be reached for comment.

The GSU voted in 2012 to endorse the BDS movement, but last fall, the board of the undergraduate University of Toronto Students' Union (UTSU) decided not to introduce a motion backing BDS at its fall annual general meeting. ■

Medical pot must be certified, MK says

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Rabbi Saul Emanuel

The Jewish Community Council of Montreal (JCCM) says medical marijuana does need kosher certification, an opinion that differs from that of the Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada.

"Any product which is ingested… must bear kosher certification," council executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel told The CJN.

"The product, [the] cannabis plant, in its raw state is kosher. It is the fact that it may be produced with other ingredients, and perhaps on a non-kosher production line, that would require the product to have reliable kosher certification."

The council, which issues the MK hechsher, calls itself "Canada's kosher certifier."

On Jan. 7, the Kashruth Council, which issues the COR hechsher, said it believes certification is unnecessary. "Something that is medicine, that's prescribed from your doctor, that you need to take for your health, that doesn't need kosher certification," the Kashruth Council's managing director, Richard Rabkin, told the media.

The organization, which describes itself as Canada's largest kashrut certification agency, made the announcement after MedReleaf, a Health Canada-licensed producer of medical cannabis based in Markham, Ont., applied for certification.

The JCCM's position is in line with that of the Orthodox Union (OU). In December, Vireo Health of New York said the OU is certifying its medical marijuana products. They went on sale Jan. 7, the day medical marijuana became legal in New York state.

The OU, like the JCCM, says the cannabis plant is inherently kosher, but the final product may contain other ingredients such as alcohol, gelatin and oil. The agency also notes marijuana isn't used exclusively for life-threatening conditions and so presumably, cannot be exempted by virtue of pikuach nefesh (saving a life).

"[E]ven in such instances where there is a threat to life, it is preferable to use a kosher medication when available," the OU said in a statement on its website.

The JCCM has not been approached by a medical marijuana producer about certification. There is only one producer licensed by Health Canada located in Quebec, Hydropothecary of Gatineau. ■

Panel on Jews and HIV sheds light on lingering stigma

jshupac@thecjn.ca

"Why, in 2016, are we still talking about HIV?"

That was the question posed by Justine Apple, director of the Jewish LGTBQ group Kulanu Toronto, in introducing a Jan. 14 panel on seeing HIV through a Jewish lens.

The discussion, held at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, marked the organization's inaugural event examining the relationship between HIV and Jewish values.

The panel consisted of Alex Klein, a founding member of the Toronto HIV Primary Care Physicians' Group, past chair of the Ontario provincial advisory committee on HIV/AIDS and a doctor who's been treating HIV since the 1980s; Jordan Lewis, a social worker at St. Michael's Hospital; Ron Rosenes, who's been living with HIV for more than 30 years and is former chair of AIDS Walk; and Louise Binder, a lawyer living with HIV who's been involved in informing health policy and treatment of the disease for more than two decades. The panel was moderated by Ryan Peck, executive director of the HIV & AIDS Legal Clinic Ontario.

The panel primarily addressed the social, political and biomedical implications of HIV having evolved from being considered a guaranteed death sentence in the 1980s to what Peck called "a chronic, manageable illness," due to sweeping medical advancements

They stressed the extent to which stigma and discrimination remain, and how these affect public policy, legislation and reaction to people with HIV.

"Nobody would say it's a picnic living with HIV, but people do live long, happy, productive lives with it, and science increasingly demonstrates that newly infected folks can live more or less the same length as someone who's HIV negative," Peck said, adding he hoped the event would spark renewed Jewish commitment to HIV issues.

He raised historical examples of Jewish involvement in the disease's early days, such as Jewish activists being among those who agitated for medications.

He noted that many people living with HIV, even in Ontario, don't have access to medications and that one in five gay men in Toronto are living with HIV.

He cited a 2012 survey that found 15 per cent of Canadians remain afraid of people with HIV and noted the stigma is evident in the fact that non-disclosure of HIV to a sexual partner is criminalized.

"HIV is essentially the only illness that's criminalized in Canada, and people are being convicted for aggravated sexual assault... for engaging in behaviours that pose little to no risk of HIV transmission," Peck said.

Rosenes spoke about the survivor's guilt he's experienced after losing many friends and a partner to HIV, and said that criminalizing non-disclosure "dampens people's desires to get tested."

Binder said women can be more vulnerable to the disease for social reasons, similar to people with less education and those living in poverty.

"I was living with a man who was a nightmare and I felt I should stay" to try to make her marriage work, she said of the ex-husband from whom she got HIV.

"Women are less well-educated, less employed, have fewer health benefits... they're often afraid what partners will do if they get tested."

Lewis said the stigma around HIV is "very real," and that even though HIV has better clinical outcomes than a disease like diabetes, the shame around HIV can make it more devastating.

Linking the need for greater compassion and understanding of HIV with traditional Jewish principles like tikkun olam, Rosenes said, "The greatest challenge... and perhaps the greatest opportunity to apply Jewish values is around the area of stigma." ■

Refugee work heralds new era of shul-driven social action

Benjamin Shinewald

In an age of declining membership and increasing secularization, Canadian synagogues are suddenly re-asserting their moral leadership and dynamism. The reason for this unexpected change? Caring for non-Jews.

Of course, caring for non-Jews is nothing new. From Ve'ahavta's role serving the homeless on Toronto's streets to IsraAID's emergency relief efforts in the most pressing humanitarian crises, there are countless examples of our community executing that most Jewish of imperatives, tikkun olam.

But while Jews routinely come together to act on moral issues through community organizations and charities, they act less often through their shuls. And yet, by one measure, one-third of the larger Canadian Jewish congregations are privately sponsoring Syrian refugees. What explains this sudden explosion of shul-driven social action?

The answer lies, in part, in the mechanics of sponsoring Syrian refugees. The Department of Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship permits groups as small as five people to sponsor refugees privately. With potential sponsors coming together pell-mell across Canada, shuls are well placed to be the forums where community activists find each other.

But the answer is much deeper than that. Welcoming refugees to Canada has become a mass exercise in nation-building, engaging Canadians from coast to coast to coast. There is a sense that this is a defining moment for Canada, one that will shape our national culture for years to come. And Canada's Jewish community, which remembers the wartime "none is too many" period all too well, is as captivated by this rallying cry as anyone. We see our engagement in this national project as a direct expression of our core Jewish values.

In other words, many Jews today yearn for a spiritual outlet for their social values. A new generation is not content with davening in a minyan or writing a cheque for tzedakah. They are hungry to take action on the central moral struggles of our day, and they want to do so Jewishly. Shuls are the logical Jewish institution to help them organize.

In fact, because Jewish refugee sponsorship is inherently a spiritual and grassroots-led initiative, larger Jewish organizations, which overwhelmingly are neither spiritually focused nor grassroots oriented, have been generally uninvolved in this massive, national project. Outside of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, a federation-funded agency that has been quietly undertaking this yeoman's work for nearly a century, the heavy lifting is being done by local groups gathering in social halls and rabbis' studies. Rabbis themselves have also lent their voices and moral authority to this issue, adding a note of spiritual leadership and reminding us all that our moral actions today are inherently rooted in our rich and ancient religious tradition.

These organic, shul-led refugee sponsorships are having ripple effects. While some congregations already host longstanding soup kitchens or lead riverbank cleanups, others are stepping up. Most famously in recent memory, when a suspicious fire damaged the only mosque in Peterborough last fall, the city's Beth Israel Synagogue immediately took in their Muslim neighbours, offering a welcome and safe place to pray and to be at home as a community. At one and the same time, the Peterborough congregation expressed the very best of Canadian and Jewish values.

The critical issues we face aren't going away: reconciling with our indigenous neighbours, eliminating child poverty and fighting for human rights are just some of the moral challenges calling us out for Jewish-led social action. Beth Israel's action-oriented spiritual responses to a pressing moral challenge can help re-situate our shuls in the centre of our communities.

And with our synagogues and our rabbis at the forefront of these struggles, they may just find themselves leading our community to greater things. ■

Panel discusses challenges facing Jews on campus

Orthodox students say it's possible to maintain a Jewish identity at university and prepare for anti-Zionist agitation, but Jewish campus professionals say there are still challenges to overcome, attendees to a Jan. 16 panel event titled "Jews on Campus" heard.

About 40 people came out to Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation Saturday night to hear from Rabbi Aaron Greenberg, director of the Jewish Learning Institute on Campus (JLIC) – Canada; Zac Kaye, former executive director Hillel of Greater Toronto and the interim executive director of Hillel at Cornell University; York University students Josh Aziza, Leora Karon and Shaili Perez; and Ryerson University student Ariel Shields.

Each of the students, who all graduated from Jewish high schools, said it isn't hard to maintain a Jewish identity on campus if someone decides to do so.

"The extent to which somebody chooses to remain involved in their Jewish identity is a personal decision," Aziza said.

"Whether they are in a dorm with a bunch of non-Jewish roommates in Maryland or they are at York University or Yeshiva University, if they are involved and they chose to go to shul, or they choose to go to a shiur, that's going to be a personal decision."

But Kaye said he's witnessed first hand "the erosion of Orthodox Jewish life on campus" and said students are generally not prepared for their new reality.

"We probably have at Cornell something like 300 or 400 students who describe themselves as Orthodox, yet the Orthodox minyan is probably about 40 or 50 people." He said students' practice levels tend to decline when they live on campus.

But Rabbi Greenberg said, "I have yet to meet a student in the 14 years I've been on campus who all of a sudden took some religious studies class and stopped keeping Shabbat and eating non-kosher. That usually doesn't happen."

Rabbi Greenberg, who taught at the Bnei Akiva high schools for about 10 years and currently teaches a course at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said Jewish high schools are working to better prepare students for life outside of the Jewish bubble, though there's always more that can be done.

"Just like the Jewish community has to provide different entry points and opportunities, whether it's social or whether it's learning, we have to provide those opportunities to students," Rabbi Greenberg said.

Elliott Malamet, Torah in Motion co-founder and the panel moderator, pointed to a recent Times of Israel article by York student Ben Shachar, who wrote about "a concerted campaign to vilify and intimidate Jewish students and institutions on campus."

Karon said students mostly turn a blind eye to the few people who protest against Israel on campus.

"People just want to go about their lives and go to class and go home, but it is important that people know how to answer a question [about Israel] if people ask about it. If you're not knowledgeable, you should know how to respond to it," she said.

Shields said debating about Israel is "an unwinnable battle."

"[Anti-Israel students] are not educated and frankly… they're not going to change their minds, so it's not worth getting into a fight with them," Shields said.

But Aziza said the battle shouldn't be for those who've already formed strong opinions, but to inform people who are unaware of the conflict and educate them about the issues.

"The strategy should be to get involved and… put what you want to say out there, so that the vast majority of people who aren't educated and don't have any prior political convictions on the matter will hear what you have to say."

Kaye recalled student leaders who wouldn't come to campus on a day there was going to be an anti-Israel demonstration.

"These are things that students shouldn't have to fear. The only way to resolve it was to open a dialogue with the administration to change the atmosphere that made it uncomfortable for Jewish students to be there… I think we've done a lot to change the way the administration saw that Jewish students were intimidated and challenged by what was going on there." ■

City budget shortchanges Jewish residents, critics say

plungen@thecjn.ca

Coun. James Pasternak

Esther Kin is a little puzzled by the decisions made by city bureaucrats. Fifteen years ago, as a volunteer mom, she was able to secure municipal and provincial funding for a snack and meal program for the girls at Bais Yaakov Elementary School. The program, which now receives more than $50,000 a year in funding, proved so successful it grew over the years from providing small snacks to serving 800 students with nutritious lunches and healthy snacks.

For the last 10 years, however, she's dutifully filled out the application forms on behalf of other Jewish day schools, offering to organize the moms into running the nutrition programs. The schools – Beth Jacob High School, Yeshiva Gedola, Yeshivas Nachalas Zvi and Bobov – have repeatedly been turned down.

Kin said hungry students can't concentrate properly and a lack of food affects their behaviour. She has been in contact with Coun. James Pasternak, a member of the city's budget committee, about the issue.

Pasternak told The CJN that Jewish schoolchildren aren't the only community members being shortchanged by city staff. Residents of city-run long term care (LTC) facilities have also seen their request for kosher food go unheeded, he said.

Late last week, correspondence between The CJN and city spokespeople revealed that only public schools are now eligible to apply for nutrition funding. (It appears Bais Yaakov has been grandfathered.)

Toronto Public Health spokesperson Carol Timmings said in an email that the "municipal and provincial government funding for new student nutrition programs is allocated to publicly funded schools in the City of Toronto. Privately funded schools, including privately funded faith-based schools, do not qualify for this expansion funding."

That response surprised Pasternak.

"We have no official policy to restrict nutrition programs to publicly funded schools. They seem to making it up on the fly," he said.

Pasternak said Toronto allocates $9.9 million to health programs. To restrict that to public schools defeats the purpose of the programs, which is to ensure all children have access to healthy foods and are taught about good nutrition.

"The problem is not the money, it's the policy," he said. "It will be my goal when the budget vote is taken [this] week and into February to make it clear that the health of all students is important, regardless of where they go to school."

Regarding kosher meals at LTC facilities, Pasternak pointed to two compliance orders by the Ministry of Health and Long Term Care (MOHLTC) instructing Cummer Lodge and Carefree Lodge to meet the dietary requests of their residents at no additional cost.

He said 42 Jewish Cummer Lodge residents have requested kosher food, as have a smaller number at Carefree Lodge.

COR, the Kashruth Council of Canada, has taken up the issue. For three years, it has lobbied the city to fund the kosher food needs of LTC residents.

Earlier this month, it filed a complaint with the city ombudsman, stating, "In multiple compliance orders, the Ministry of Health has noted that the city is in violation of [legislation], most notably with respect to Cummer Lodge and Carefree Lodge."

Asked to comment, city spokesperson Jennifer Wing said, "The two compliance orders received by the City of Toronto's long-term care homes over the past number of years that related to kosher meals were both quickly and fully addressed."

She added the city gets $8.03 per day from the province to provide meals and snacks at LTC residences, while the daily cost of kosher meals is $23.

"The MOHLTC does not provide additional funding for ethnic, cultural or religious meal requirements for residents in long-term care homes," she added.

In a separate response to a CJN question, John Gosgnach, communications manager for the City of Toronto, stated, "As none of the city's long-term care homes have a kosher kitchen, we work in partnership with families and community agencies to facilitate kosher catered meals for residents.

"The additional cost is covered by families and community agencies."

Responding to Gosgnach's statement, Pasternak said he believes the city is providing "kosher-style" food, while COR said that to its knowledge, the compliance orders haven't been implemented.

As to asking families and community agencies to cover the additional cost of kosher meals, the MOHLTC compliance order regarding Cummer Lodge, states that "kosher meals and other assessed dietary needs must be provided at no charge to the resident."

Similar language was used in the Carefree Lodge compliance order. ■

Historians will rarely proclaim 'the lessons of history'

When I tell people that I am writing about lessons of the Holocaust, they pause, wondering how I can possibly add to what is so regularly alluded to. They may also feel that the topic is hackneyed. Don't we already know the lessons of the Holocaust?

But what are these lessons of the Holocaust, after all? Is there general agreement about them? Do the lessons differ from one place to another? And do they change over time?

I believe that these questions go to the heart of Holocaust history and even history in general – in particular why we care about studying the past and what we expect to learn from it. There are many purported lessons out there, and they cannot all have the same transcendent significance or validity. Moreover, the lessons vary a great deal depending on when, where, and by whom they were formulated, and they derive crucially from often-contested interpretations of the Holocaust.

For example, some contend that the lesson of the Holocaust is that Jews are always hated, in one way or another, and can only count on themselves. Others claim, that the lesson of the Holocaust is that all seemingly well-integrated minorities are vulnerable and require special protection. Which is correct? Can they both be right? And even more important, is there something wrong with formulating in this way what we are supposed to learn from the Holocaust?

> But what are these lessons of the Holocaust, after all? Is there general agreement about them? Do the lessons differ from one place to another? And do they change over time?

I think it is interesting that those who are most intensely and systematically involved in the subject have the keenest sense of difficulties in establishing such lessons. That is why, sensing that their competence does not extend to the formulation of such matters, specialists often feel so uncomfortable with them.

With non-Holocaust fields, such respectful caution is widely accepted as appropriate. Few historians nowadays will presume to proclaim "the lessons of history" or the capacity to predict the future deriving from a study of the past. And yet, the public at large seems to be firmly committed to the notion that the Holocaust is different. Overwhelmingly, people seem to believe that there are lessons of the Holocaust that can be reduced to explicit propositions and that Holocaust scholars should not shrink from proclaiming them.

Perhaps one reason for this is that the Holocaust is not like other subjects. The historian Arno Mayer once referred to it as "a fundamental touchstone of the depth and extremity of the dislocation of Western civilization during the first half of the 20th century." It is probably the one case of genocide most people can identify. And similarly, as columnist Jonah Goldberg observes, World War II may not seem so much like history, because in fact it is the only history about which many people know – or think they know. People may feel more comfortable hearkening to it for lessons even while they may be wary of applying the unfamiliar experiences of far-off times and places.

To those who work on the Holocaust in particular, given the sheer, unmitigated horror of the events themselves, there may also be irresistible pressures to find redemptive outcomes – conditions that restore one's faith in human decency, or provide illustrations of exemplary human resilience.

And sometimes these can be fashioned into lessons that can be digested and followed. The American writer Susan Jacoby argues that the search for Holocaust lessons may have a religious origin: "the idea that there are some sort of general moral lessons to be derived from the Holocaust is rooted in the religious concept that something good must come out of something bad – that everything, however terrible, is part of a greater plan wrought by an intelligent Designer.

Otherwise, how could anyone justify continuing to believe in a benevolent supreme being after such a cataclysm?"

Consequently, authorities on the Holocaust may feel that they are expected, even if not in so many words, to present lessons to be derived from their studies. Indeed, to the extent that I participate in civil society, I myself may engage in Holocaust-related public education, commemoration, memorialization, and civic commitments that sometimes associate the Holocaust, for heuristic purposes, with particular causes –tolerance, anti-racism, humanitarian responsibilities in public affairs, and the like.

Might it also be that audiences are intimidated by claims of lessons of the Holocaust because proponents wrap themselves in the authority that comes from exposing terrible wrongs, to the point that critics dare not push back? We need to remember that those who advance Holocaust lessons often assume great moral authority. And they sometimes do so in an environment facing desperate dilemmas and challenges, including some that entail quite calamitous implications. Does the growth of anti-Semitism prefigure mass violence against Jews? Should we read particularly violent political rhetoric as prefiguring genocide? How far should we go to aid victims in distress? Should one's country intervene militarily in conflict X or in country Y? An appreciation of Holocaust history can be adduced as a key to resolving such questions. The idea seems to be that guides to correct courses of action lie just beneath the surface of Holocaust narratives, and that familiarity with such material, fortified with moral stamina, will reveal the right path to follow.

Naysayers, one can appreciate, hardly feel in a strong position.

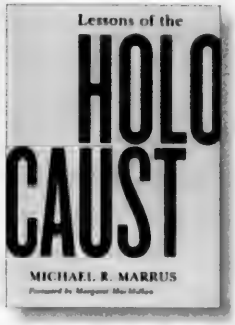
I sometimes think about lessons when I see, as I do several times a week at Massey College of the University of Toronto, a lengthy academic injunction that ends, "To be happy, you must be wise." This quotation from the writings of the Spanish-American philosopher and essayist George Santayana completes a lengthy passage inscribed along the perimeter of Massey's dining hall, where gowned students and professors file in regularly, for dinner.

To the extent that those present gaze up at this quotation, they may connect not only with its encouragement to learning but also with a related notion, so often applied to the Holocaust that it has come to be taken as one of its core lessons. I am referring to what is probably the best known among Santayana's observations, "Those who cannot remember history are doomed to repeat it."

In some quarters Santayana's dictum has come to be thought of as a Holocaust lesson in itself, a warning that a comparable cataclysm might recur if events like the destruction of European Jewry were not "remembered" and its lessons were to go unheeded. Note that, according to the quotation, what is necessary is not to understand, but to "remember" what has happened – although by remembrance is usually meant acquaintance or re-acquaintance with terrible injustices and suffering. Moreover, claims of the existence of such lessons are often accompanied by a sense that promoting them is urgent – indeed, that inattention to such lessons is likely to prompt terrible consequences. History has spoken, and we ignore her voice at our peril.



This is another, less explicitly descriptive kind of lesson – a suggestion that a close acquaintance with atrocities that happened during the Holocaust constitutes a lesson that should prompt people to behave more wisely or humanely. In Washington, groups of military personnel and police officers constantly tour the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum precisely with this object in mind. I admit to being puzzled about the rationale that is assumed to be operating here. After all, those who are most familiar with the outrages of the Holocaust were the perpetrators themselves – and there is no evidence that a full knowledge of their own wrongdoing ever generated their revulsion against it.

In his memoirs, the historian and essayist Walter Laqueur reflected on this theme while discussing how a great part of his life had been exposed to totalitarian regimes in Germany and the Soviet Union. There is no guarantee that such "lessons of history" – that is, persistent acquaintance with cruelty to others – will clarify things one way or another, he observes. In his view, some will emerge from such exposure with a more acute sense of the possibilities of wrongdoing, but some will do the opposite. The lessons of history, like all lessons, "can be misunderstood and misapplied."

Since I have devoted so much of my professional life to the study of the Holocaust, my commitment to its study should be clear. I do not disparage deep reflection on the knowledge we accumulate on this topic, which I believe is one of the foundational events of our age. I believe that the Holocaust is a moral signifier for thinking about good and evil and, perhaps even more important, for pondering what has been called the grey zone, the great space in between. And I also believe that studying the Holocaust contributes to the public good.

But I contest the idea that there exist some formulae that constitute lessons of the Holocaust – or even worse, the lessons of the Holocaust. In a nutshell, the problem with such lessons is that, unfortunately, history does not speak to the present with so clear an admonitory voice. Looking critically at the lessons of the Holocaust, I believe that, like all history, the Holocaust nevertheless has much to teach us, even when it does not direct us how to solve the problems of our time. ■

Headstone maker recruits pair to help serve Jewish clients

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Eden Memorials – which until three years ago was Winnipeg's last Jewish-owned memorial stone maker – is closing at the end of this month, but a non-Jewish company is confident it can serve the community with the help of two former Eden stalwarts.

With the addition of Clare Walters to its staff along with Lorne Raber as a consultant, Larsen Memorials, one of Winnipeg's oldest memorial stone makers, is looking forward to attracting most of the Jewish clients who would otherwise have patronized Eden.

"For almost 50 years, Eden Memorials was the only Jewish-owned memorial company in Winnipeg and the only memorial company specializing in Jewish memorials," said Raber, who owned of Eden until three years ago and was the face of the business.

The company was started by the Juravsky family in 1967. In 1995, Lorne Raber, who was related to the family by marriage, bought the company and continued its tradition of serving the Jewish community, as well as the wider Winnipeg market.

The personable Raber was well known in the Jewish community and was a leader and innovator in the memorial industry. He served a term as president of the Monument Builders of North America.

Also instrumental in Eden Memorials' success during the latter years of his ownership, Raber said, was his office manager, Walters. She started working at Eden shortly after moving to Winnipeg from South Africa in 2001.

"Clare is one of the most detailed people I have ever met," Raber said, "and she is very good at dealing with people."

Three years ago, Raber, who was facing some health issues and aged in-laws, sold his business to a non-Jewish couple and continued to make himself available to the new owners to meet with Jewish clients by appointment.

In December 2014, Walters left Eden to work from her home in Winnipeg with a cousin who operates a software company out of Vancouver.

While Raber doesn't know why the business ultimately failed, he said demand for Jewish headstones isn't what it used to be.

"When I started in this business 20 years ago, the number of Jewish burials was between 190 and 215 annually," he said. "Last year, there were only 135 to 140 Jewish burials here.

"People are living longer, and the Jewish community is skewing younger."

Last summer, Walters was looking to get back into the memorial business and put out some feelers. She knew all of Eden's Jewish clients going back more than 10 years, so Larsen Memorials snapped her up.

"We thought that Clare would be a real asset to our firm," said David Bohn, who along with his brother Dennis and sister Shelly acquired the company from the Larsen family 15 years ago. " A lot of people know her."

Shelly Bohn added that "with our design system... we can produce Jewish letters."

And like he was at Eden, Raber will be available at Larsen to meet with former and current clients to help provide for their memorial needs.

"This is a win-win scenario," he said. ■

Israeli envoys plug trade on visit to snowy Fredericton

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

Despite a day that started at 8:30 a.m. in the midst of a snowstorm and didn't end until 9 p.m., after the storm passed, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Rafael Barak, termed his visit to Fredericton, N.B., "tiring, but successful."

Accompanied by Ziv Nevo Kulman, Israel's consul general to Quebec and Atlantic Canada, Barak said the one-day whirlwind trip to the provincial capital Jan. 13 aimed to "discover trade opportunities between New Brunswick and Israel in technology and science.

"Cyber security was a major focus of our talks with people at University of New Brunswick and provincial government officials," Barak said after his return to Ottawa Jan. 14. It was the first visit to Fredericton for both men.

"Deputy Premier Stephen Horsman and David Burns [UNB's vice-president of research] both stressed that the university is working hard in the cyber security field along with IBM, which has a Canadian centre for cyber security established in Fredericton. IBM is a major player in the field at Ben-Gurion University in Be'er Sheva, Israel's centre for cyber security."

Barak and Nevo Kulman paid a protocol visit to N.B. Lieut.-Gov. Jocelyne Roy Vienneau, and they also visited with the director and associate director of UNB's Security Centre of Excellence as well as the university's chief information officer; IBM representatives; Stephen Lund, CEO of Opportunities New Brunswick; and Matt Decourcey, Liberal MP for Fredericton, who "expressed his eagerness to co-operate with Israel," Barak said.

"Except for Stephen Lund [who visited Israel as part of a Nova Scotia delegation a few years ago], the majority of those we met have never been to Israel, so it gave us a chance to introduce what is happening in the business and development side of our country," added Barak, Israel's ambassador to Canada since January 2014.

"We even had the Israeli flag raised in front of Province House, which was closed at the time because of the snowstorm."

The storm prevented Premier Brian Gallant from returning to Fredericton from a business trip to Moncton to meet with the Israeli delegation.

"I found affinities between Israel and New Brunswick," said Barak, "particularly between Fredericton and Be'er Sheva. We invited UNB officials to a cyber conference in Israel later this year and will suggest the director of the Cyber Park in Israel come to Fredericton to meet with local officials."

The envoys concluded their day with a two-hour session at Sgoolai Israel Synagogue, where they met close to 30 members of the Fredericton Jewish community.

Synagogue president and Atlantic Jewish Council management committee member Marilyn Kaufman welcomed the visitors, who spoke about the purpose of their trip and reflected on its benefits. They also talked about Israel's current situation with its Middle East neighbours and spoke about many aspects of economic connection with Canada.

"Mr. Barak told how the Canadian Space Agency is sharing with Israel the launch of the Amos 6 satellite in 2017 and stressed how 25 multinational companies are taking part in cyber security development in Israel. He said Israel was the fourth country to have a free trade agreement with Canada while stressing Israel doesn't 'take the relationship of Canada's Jewish communities with Israel for granted.'"

Answering an audience question about Canada's support for Israel under Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, Barak said Trudeau met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a few weeks ago and will meet with him again soon. He said Trudeau assured him good relations with Israel will continue and Canada will support Israel at the United Nations. ■

CJC name gone as national Jewish archives 'rebranded'

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The repository of much of the documentation of the history of the Canadian Jewish community has a new name and administrative structure.

The Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives is now called the Alex Dworkin Canadian Jewish Archives. The "rebranding" follows the formal cessation of the operations of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and its charitable trust in late November.

CJC was officially shuttered in 2011 when its responsibilities were taken over by the organization today known as the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

The archives will remain in Montreal, but the national archives program now operates "directly under the auspices of Jewish Federations Canada-UIA (JFC-UIA)," according to a Jan. 12 press release.

Established in 1934, the archives have been housed for many years on the lower level of the former CJC national headquarters on Docteur Penfield Avenue. That building, now owned by Concordia University, is also the home of its Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

For the average person, the change will have little or no effect, archives director Janice Rosen said. "Absolutely no different from the public's point of view, and even not internally, as [the Toronto-based] JFC-UIA was already responsible for managing our accounting functions and payroll," she wrote. "We began receiving the Dworkin funding in 2011, so this change of name is fitting and appropriate…"

Linda Kislowicz, JFC-UIA president and chief executive officer, said the organization "is committed to ensuring the long-term preservation of this historic home for archives and archival research. We will provide the necessary support and oversight so that this venerable institution continues to serve as an invaluable resource for researchers and historians."

Alex Dworkin, who died in 2004, and his wife, Ruth, were major philanthropists in the Montreal Jewish community and beyond, and their legacy continues to benefit many institutions.

One branch, the Alex Dworkin Foundation for Jewish Archives, under the administration of the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal (JCF), also supports Montreal's Jewish Public Library Archives.

The two archives have a close collaboration and jointly conceived and manage the Canadian Jewish Heritage Network, an online platform that encourages national partnerships in this field and is sustained by the Dworkin fund.

The archives' mission remains essentially what it was at its founding more than 80 years ago. "We will continue to fulfil the aims of the resolution 'On Canadian Jewish Archives' set out at the CJC plenary assembly in 1934," Rosen said, which is "to collect, store and preserve historical material related to Canadian Jewry and make it accessible for the purpose of study and reference."

JCF executive vice-president Robert Kleinman added that "the Dworkin fund has been a key supporter of the archives since 2011 and is very pleased to continue to serve as a critical partner in the management of its evolution." Since 1992, the archives has also benefited from a program of the Bibliothèque et Archives nationales du Québec.

The archives is home not only to the records of CJC, but to hundreds of collections received over the years from individuals and groups. Norma Joseph, a Concordia religion professor and CJN columnist, is chair of the archives' advisory committee. ■

Correction

The Jan. 14 story "Can Tories hold on to Jewish voters?" incorrectly stated the proportion of the vote Liberal MP Anthony Housefather received in Mount Royal riding in last fall's federal election. He got 50.3 per cent of the vote. The CJN regrets the error. ■

Stabbing victim Dafna Meir buried in Jerusalem

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Dafna Meir was buried in Jerusalem on Monday, a day after she was stabbed to death at the entrance to her home in the West Bank settlement of Otniel.

Hundreds joined the funeral procession for the mother of six, two of them foster children, which set out from Otniel toward the Har Hamenuhot cemetery in Jerusalem.

Meir, 39, a nurse, wrestled with the attacker with three of her children in the house. She was stabbed and left for dead as the attacker fled.

Media reports said her daughter Renana, 17, witnessed the attack, which took place at around 5 p.m., and described the terrorist to authorities.

Delivering a eulogy at the cemetery Monday, Renana said: "You left us with an enormous vacuum. We won't drink tea at midnight any more… You won't come with me to my wedding, to the army, to the delivery room. I'm sorry I couldn't help you during the hardest moments."

Her husband, Natan, who recited the Mourner's Prayer with son Akiva, 15, said he had met Dafna during military service in southern Lebanon. "It took a moment to fall in love, and as I said then, 'Welcome.' Now, I'm saying 'have a good journey,'" he said.

As family and friends gathered for the start of the funeral procession, the assistant director of the Soroka Medical Center in Beersheba, Prof. Yohanan Feizer, said: "Dafna dealt in saving lives and her life was plucked from her in front of her children."

She had always performed above and beyond what was expected of her, with "endless generosity," he added, according to Haaretz.

Efrat Dahan, who met regularly with Meir, said she and others had lost "a sister, not only in her profession, but in the heart and soul."

"Beloved Dafna, we met four years ago, when I came to the community," she added. "I sat for a while at the playground and we started to talk about the most personal of things. I was so pleased that we became good friends, right away and for always. One could speak to you about anything, you knew so much."

Among those present at Har Hamenuhot were Education Minister Naftali Bennett, Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked and Deputy Defence Minister Eli Ben Dahan – all from the pro-settler Jewish Home party – as well as Minister of Culture and Sport Miri Regev (Likud) and opposition leader Isaac Herzog (Zionist Union).

Bennett eulogized Meir as a "special soul," saying she "brought life to every place."

"Even in your last moments," he said, "you brought light and love. You fought a terrorist and defended your children." He added, "To a people like that that murders a mother in front of her children, there will not be a state. There is no state for hatred."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Monday morning that he had promised the head of the Otniel municipality, Yochai Damari, that the settlement would be strengthened. He pledged that Israel would find anyone who tried to harm Israelis and that he would pay "the full price" for his actions.

As the buses in the funeral procession approached Jerusalem, another woman, Michal Froman was stabbed by a teenage Palestinian attacker in the West Bank settlement of Tekoa. She was moderately wounded.

Otniel, which lies 56 kilometres (35 miles) south of Jerusalem, has an early-warning system and the terrorist's exit was filmed on a security camera. However, after combing villages in the south Hebron Hills area for hours, security forces had yet to close in on the killer, and he remained on the loose by The CJN's Monday deadline.

Assuming that he had been a worker in the settlement, investigators were checking building contractors and a transport contractor in the area, Israel Radio reported. ■

PA collapse will lead to 'anarchy' minister says

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

In a rare, candid interview about Israeli thinking on the condition of the Palestinian Authority (PA), a member of Israel's security cabinet warned that the authority is already collapsing, and what follows will be "anarchy."

"This is a reality we may wake up to tomorrow morning, within months or perhaps after a year or two of collapse," Absorption Minister Ze'ev Elkin, a member of the security cabinet and considered close to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, told the right-wing Makor Rishon newspaper for its weekend edition.

"In my view, the train has already left the station, and it's important to understand that the post-Abbas era is around the corner. He's grown tired and weak, and there are forces working against him," Elkin said.

"In the [Palestinian] street, he is treated as a dead horse, and that's part of the reason for the security situation we are going through," Elkin added. "He himself now understands that his threats to resign threaten his own rule first and foremost, so he now suddenly declares, 'I'm here.'"

Meanwhile, the Palestinians are not immune to the influence of the Arab Spring, which has felled unelected leaders across the Arab world, and led to bloody civil wars in several countries, Elkin said.

Palestinians "see the same television and are susceptible to the same spirit as elsewhere in the region. It's only a matter of time before the Arab Spring gets to them. It's only natural that this will happen."

A former chairman of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee and one-time deputy foreign minister, Elkin believes the Israeli defence establishment is not planning for what is to come.

"It's not a question of understanding, but of internalizing. There is a basic mistake here of sticking one's head in the sand and clinging to the existing situation, and this leads to blindness. But the writing is on the wall, and the Palestinian Authority will collapse in any case, without any connection to us."

Of the many possible scenarios that may ensue from this collapse, he told Makor Rishon, the most likely is "anarchy."

"There is almost zero chance that an heir will arise as [Abbas] did after Yasser Arafat. There isn't anyone who can take the keys by consensus."

Marwan Barghouti, the popular Fatah leader currently serving five life terms in an Israeli prison for murders committed during the second intifadah, is unlikely to be released by Israel – "I hope," Elkin added.

That leaves shared rule among many contenders to Abbas' rule, which would be unprecedented in Palestinian history; a takeover by Hamas, which would be prevented by Israel; or the most likely scenario: "a war of all against all, a battle to inherit, and everything that flows from that."

The collapse is certain, Elkin argues; its ramifications, for the moment at least, "are unknowable." ■

Bibi says Israel kept nukes out of Iran

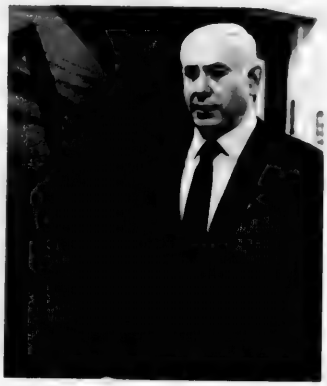
TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Jan. 17 that the Jewish State's efforts had put a nuclear bomb out of Iran's reach for the time being.

"If it weren't for our efforts leading the way in enforcing the sanctions on Iran's nuclear program, Iran would have had a nuclear weapon long ago," the prime minister said at the opening of the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem, a day after the implementation of the landmark accord and the removal of sanctions from the Islamic Republic was announced.

"Israel's position is, and remains exactly as it has always been – to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. What's clear is that Iran will now turn its resources toward its terrorist activity in the region and rest of the world, and Israel is prepared to handle that threat," he said.

The premier, who has been perhaps the most vocal opponent of the deal on the global stage, reiterated remarks he made in a statement the day before, and called on world powers to reinstate "severe" sanctions on Iran if it breaches the terms of the nuclear agreement.



Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu FLASH 90

Netanyahu said that Israel would continue to monitor the implementation of the deal and would notify the international community of any Iranian violations.

On Saturday, Jan. 16, Netanyahu warned that "without an appropriate response to every violation, Iran will surmise that it can continue to develop nuclear weapons, to destabilize the region and to spread terrorism." Israel, he said, "will do everything it takes to maintain its security and defend itself."

Earlier on Saturday, an Israeli official said that Iran's first priority once the deal is implemented would be to spend its newly freed-up funds on military acquisitions, and not on civilian investments, Army Radio reported. Furthermore, the unnamed source said, the implementation of the agreement would have a direct impact on the region, as terror groups Hezbollah and Hamas – both recipients of Iranian largesse – would find themselves in possession of new and modern weaponry.

"The world powers are mistaken if they see Iran as a solution to regional stability, and not the source of the problem," a second unnamed official said, according to the radio. ■

ANALYSIS

A dark day for the Middle East

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

Iran's Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif tweeted on Jan. 16 that "it's now time for all – especially Muslim nations – to join hands and rid the world of violent extremism. Iran is ready."

That assertion coincided with the latest report that another resident of Madaya, the Syrian city besieged by the forces of (Iranian ally) President Bashar Assad, had died of starvation. It also came amid the ongoing daily news of the killing of civilians in Syria by Assad's forces, backed by fighters from Iran's Revolutionary Guards and the Iranian-armed Hezbollah. About 250,000 people have been killed in the Syrian civil war, the vast majority of them by Assad's Iran-assisted forces.

The Islamic State's (ISIS) contribution to the relentlessly rising Syrian death toll cannot be ignored. Just this weekend, its forces reportedly perpetrated another massacre of Assad forces and their families in the Deir el-Zour area.

But if anyone in the Obama administration or the European leadership believes that the Syrian fighting is a case of "good guys" (Assad, Iran, Hezbollah) against "bad guys" (ISIS), they need to check the facts.

The removal of sanctions from Iran is not a festive day for the Middle East. It is, rather, a grim day for the region, which will see billions flowing into the Iranian regime's coffers, part of which will lead to a great deal more weaponry, conflict, bloodshed, and death throughout this area.

To Iran's great benefit, ISIS is devoting a huge amount of money and resources in order to ensure that it is perceived as a force of absolute evil. One consequence is to create the impression that the Iranian regime, by comparison, is relatively pragmatic, an entity with which one can negotiate. But then comes the news from Madaya – as well as many, many places beyond – to remind us about the true face of the Iranian regime. A glance at the numerous areas of conflict in our region underlines Iran's ubiquitous involvement in the bloodshed – everywhere from Yemen, to Iraq, to Syria, Lebanon, and even the Gaza Strip.

This should have long since set alarm bells ringing in the White House. But the likes of Susan Rice and Ben Rhodes are locked into the delusion that Iran will save the world from Sunni Islamic extremists. It would be amusing if it wasn't so tragic.

Apart from Iran's citizens, of course, those who are about to benefit from the lifting of sanctions on Iran include: Hezbollah, which already has some 150,000 rockets and missiles of various ranges and accuracy, and which is now set to receive much-increased financial assistance from Iran; the popular militias in Iraq; the Houthis in Yemen; and Hamas in Gaza (as well as Islamic Jihad there, should Iran feel so inclined).

For relatively moderate Sunni states, this is a grim day, indeed – a day on which Iran is welcomed back to the international community and is simultaneously assisted in deepening its capacity to back terrorist and destabilizing forces in those Sunni states and beyond.

True, the Arak heavy-water plant is unlikely to produce a plutonium bomb in the near future. But the nuclear deal and the removal of sanctions will only exacerbate Shiite terrorism, and it won't do anything for the starving people of Madaya. ■

Making the third visit ever by a pope to Rome's Great Synagogue, Pope Francis and Jewish leaders condemned violence in the name of religion and said the extraordinary rapprochement between Jews and Catholics over the past 50 years should serve as a model for other faiths.

"Conflicts, wars, violence and injustices open deep wounds in humanity and call on us to reinforce the commitment to peace and justice," Pope Francis said Jan. 17.

"The violence of man against man is in contradiction with any religion worthy of the name, and in particular with the three great monotheistic religions," he said. "Every human being, as a creature of God, is our brother regardless of his origins or religious belief."

Rome Chief Rabbi Riccardo Di Segni described "fanatic visions inspired by religion" that are used to justify violence and terrorism in the Middle East, Europe and elsewhere in the world.

"A meeting of peace between different religious communities, as the one that is taking place today here in Rome, is a very strong sign against the invasion and abuse of religious violence," he said.

Pope Francis' visit comes half a century after the Vatican's landmark Nostra Aetate declaration, which opened the way to formal Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

Pope John Paul II became the first reigning pope to visit a synagogue, in April 1986, a watershed event where he embraced the then-chief rabbi and called Jews Christianity's "elder brothers." The Jewish presence in Rome stretches back more than 2,000 years, and the community is considered the oldest in the Diaspora.

Pope Benedict XVI followed up with a visit to the Rome synagogue in January 2010.

"According to the juridical rabbinic traditions, an act repeated three times becomes chazakah, a habit," Rabbi Di Segni said. "Clearly this is a concrete sign of the new era, after all that happened in the past."

During his speech to a sanctuary packed with Jewish community members and representatives of the government, international Jewish organizations, the State of Israel and other faiths, Pope Francis stressed that Christianity is rooted in Judaism.

Holocaust serves as a lesson for past and future: pope

"You are, in fact, our older brothers and sisters in faith," he said. Christians, he added, "to understand themselves, cannot fail to make reference to the Jewish roots, and the Church, while professing salvation through faith in Christ, recognized the irrevocability of the Ancient Alliance and constant and faithful love of God for Israel."

The pope said the experience of the Holocaust must serve as a lesson for the present and the future.

"The Shoah teaches us that we always need the greatest vigilance to intervene promptly in defense of human dignity and peace," he said.

Pope Francis also addressed his personal feeling of closeness to Holocaust survivors, a group of whom were seated in the first row of the sanctuary.

"Tonight's visit was warm, direct and clear on both sides. There was agreement over common roots with diverse paths leading to the achievement of common ideals, involving closer co-operation to combat the major evils of our times," Lisa Palmieri Billig, the American Jewish Committee representative in Rome, told JTA. "I believe the main message of Pope Francis' visit is that both Jews and Catholics today are discovering that our special relationship is a gift to be treasured and used constructively."

She said the pope's visit could be described as a confirmation of all the advances in Jewish-Catholic dialogue to date.

These included highly significant statements contained in a new document on Catholic-Jewish relations issued by the Vatican on Dec. 10, plus those made by Pope Francis himself. They are, for example, no Christian can be anti-Semitic; all Christians have Jewish roots; salvation is possible for Jews even without their belief in Christ; the Torah is to Jews what Christ is to Christians; Christians must not try to convert Jews; and that Judaism and Christianity have a unique relationship.

In her speech during the pope's 90-minute visit to the synagogue, Ruth Dureghello, the president of the Rome Jewish community, recalled the pontiff's visit to Jerusalem in 2014, and his hope that Israel "will be able to live in peace and security."

She said,"In order to make this dream come true, we have to remember that peace cannot be conquered through stabbing and terror. It cannot be achieved through bloodshed in the streets of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Itamar, Beth Shemesh and Sderot. It cannot be obtained by digging tunnels nor by launching missiles. Can we work on the peace process by counting the number of victims of terrorism? No, we can't. We must all call for a stop to terrorism. Not only the terrorism in Madrid, London, Brussels and Paris, but also the daily terrorist attacks in Israel. Terrorism is never justified."

While the pope's visit was taking place, in the latest terrorist stabbing attack, 39-year-old Dafna Meir, was killed in her home on Sunday evening in the West Bank settlement of Otniel.

Dureghello also recalled the anti-Semitic terrorist attack in the pope's native city, Buenos Aires, on July 18, 1994, which claimed 85 lives and wounded over 200 people.

She noted that Rome had already been hit by anti-Semitic terror attacks decades ago, including an attack on the Great Synagogue on October 9 1982, when Palestinian terrorists killed a toddler and injured scores.

She said, "Pope Francis, today we have a great responsibility vis-a-vis the world for the bloodshed by terrorists in Europe and in the Middle East, for the blood of persecuted Christians and for the attacks against unarmed civilians even within the Arab world, for the heinous crimes against women. We cannot sit and look. We cannot remain indifferent. We cannot make the same mistakes of the past, when we remained silent and turned our backs."■

On foreign agents, NGOs and Israeli politics

Gerald Steinberg

> If passed (law) would require NGO recipients to register as foreign agents.

For almost 20 years, the European Union and individual states have together pumped more than one billion euros ($1.3 billion Cdn) into a small group of Israeli and Palestinian non-governmental organizations, or NGOs, with a few million more from the United States, Canada (before Stephen Harper became prime minister) and elsewhere. The nature and scale of this outside interference is unique, and the impact is magnified by the use of this money primarily to oppose government policies and promote boycotts of Israel. Instead of representing "civil society" in the democratic process, these organizations are waging a dangerous war of demonization, using terms such as "war crimes" and "apartheid" under the façade of human rights.

The issue has recently dominated headlines in the Israeli media and urgent Knesset sessions, including the introduction of legislation that, if passed, would require NGO recipients to register as foreign agents. In response, the NGO officials and their allies at the New Israel Fund, Ha'aretz and among left-wing politicians attacked the critics as McCarthyite fascists intent on destroying democracy.

This battle has been simmering since the publication of the discredited UN Goldstone report on Gaza in 2009, which was based on hundreds of NGO allegations, many of which were false or unverifiable. Their claims fed boycott campaigns and attempts in Britain and elsewhere to arrest Israelis as alleged "war criminals," including former foreign minister Tzipi Livni and military officers. In response, Israeli criticism of these groups and their funders increased significantly. A number of politicians on the right introduced legislation to punish the NGOs, but these proposals were designed primarily to gain votes and did not get far.

In late 2015, the NGO issue resurfaced after Breaking the Silence (BTS), an NGO run by 10 activists but with a $1-million budget, attacked the IDF in a number of venues around the world. Their events in churches, universities and national parliaments featured "anonymous testimony" alleging systematic immorality by soldiers, but with no confirmation. BTS appearances in Ireland, Scotland and South Africa, partnered with vicious anti-Israel and even anti-Semitic groups, were heavily criticized in the Israeli media.

In response, hundreds of IDF reserve officers petitioned the minister of defence, demanding that these radical activists be barred from speaking on military bases. In parallel, relatives of soldiers killed in war and of terror victims demanded that Education Minister Naftali Bennett prohibit BTS members from speaking to high-school students. These developments fuelled support to the NGO "foreign agent" registration legislation proposed by Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked.

Another layer was added in two television broadcasts on Israel's Channel 2 in a program that is generally considered to be sympathetic to the left. The hidden cameras focused on a far-left anti-occupation group known as Ta'ayush, run by Ezra Nawi. He is shown discussing how to turn over an Arab involved in selling land to Jews to Palestinian counter-intelligence forces, viewed as equivalent to a death sentence. In this plot, Nawi (who was later caught at the airport trying to flee) is joined by a Palestinian employee of B'tselem, a prominent human rights NGO.

In a second segment, Nawi receives cash from BTS in what seems to be a plan to pay Palestinians involved in violent riots against IDF troops. In addition, the video showed a check to Nawi issued by Rabbis for Human Rights (RHR), ostensibly for transportation services. B'tselem, BTS and RHR are all funded in large part by the European Union and individual governments, adding to demands for legislation to limit these transfers.

Europe's money, and the contrast between high moral rhetoric and less-than-moral behaviour, ensures that this issue will remain high on Israel's agenda. The fight will be long and bitter, but after 20 years of unlimited access to money and influence, the central role of unelected and radical NGOs inside Israeli politics, and in waging war outside the country, is likely to fade. ■

Buried Soviet-era Yiddish tunes come to life

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Thousands of Yiddish song lyrics, stored for decades in sealed boxes in the basement of the Ukrainian National Library, have given us the rare opportunity to look into the world of Yiddish-speaking Soviet Jewry during the Holocaust era.

Some 2.7 million Soviet Jews died during the Holocaust years, but until the boxes were discovered in the 1990s, the only information about Soviet Jews in the Holocaust came from the perpetrators rather than Jews, said Anna Shternshis, the Al and Malka Green associate professor in Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto.

Although the boxes were labelled, few people had paid attention to their contents until 2005, when Shternshis, on a grant, dove into them and retrieved a treasure-trove of handwritten and typed Yiddish documents, including song lyrics, stories and letters from Jewish Red Army soldiers.

The documents were collected in Ukraine from 1943 to 1947 by several ethnomusicologists, including Moisei Beregovsky, then head of the Cabinet for Jewish Musical Folklore of the Institute of Jewish Proletarian Culture in Kiev.

> Like a time capsule from 1945.

Shternshis said it would have been dangerous for Holocaust survivors and Jewish Red Army soldiers to talk about, or for even for scholars to ask them about their wartime experiences. Paranoid, Stalin considered anyone who survived the war under German occupation a traitor, especially if they were Jewish.

"They would say, 'How could you survive if you're a Jew? You must have collaborated with the Germans. Songs were OK because there was no way to know where the song was written and who was singing it."

In 1949, Beregovsky and his team were arrested and accused of being Jewish nationalists. With the creation of Israel, policies toward Jews changed and the Soviet government had adopted a policy of state anti-Semitism. The Yiddish archive was seized as proof of their nationalist activity.

The songs Shternshis found in the archive are "like a time capsule from 1945," she said. Some are funny. Others are about fighting Hitler and getting revenge. The "guilt" songs document the experiences of soldiers who returned home to find their entire families dead. A Jew enlisted in the Red Army was more likely to survive the war than a Jewish civilian, she said.

Women also have a voice in the collection, with songs about waiting for their husbands and children to return from the war. "They tell them, 'You go and fight the Germans and I will make you a burial shroud for Hitler,'" Shternshis said.

In 2014, Shternshis worked with Psoy Korolenko, a poet, philologist and performer of Yiddish music who matched the song lyrics with tunes from Soviet musicals of the 1940s and '50s. Some of the songs – currently being recorded will receive their world premiere in Richmond Hill, on Jan. 27.

The performers include Korolenko and Trio Loyko, accordionist Alexander Sevastian, trumpeter David Buchbinder, clarinetist/conductor Shalom Bard and vocalists Isac Rosenberg and Toronto jazz singer Sophie Milman, one of Shternshis' former students.

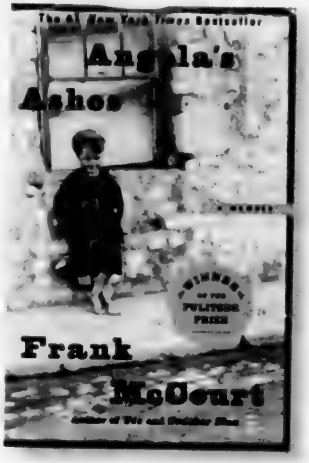
Born in Russia, Milman immigrated to Israel and then to Canada with her family. Her two grandfathers, both from Ukraine, came home after the war, to find their families – parents, siblings, nieces, nephews – had perished, she said. "I feel like the world is aware of what happened in concentration camps, but not of what Soviet Jews endured and overcame."

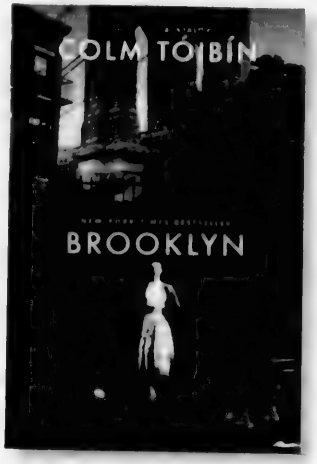
About the songs, Milman said, "There's something very special about the efforts of these impressionable, mostly young people – unlucky enough to be caught in one of the ugliest chapters of human history – to express themselves through song." ■

Yiddish Glory: The Lost Songs of Life and Fate, will be performed at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts on Jan. 27 at 8 p.m. www.showone-productions.ca or call the box office 905-787-8811.

The immigrant saga, from Brooklyn to Boston

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN





First, a bit of movie trivia: what New York-born Jewish actor plays an Italian-American in love with an Irish immigrant plumber in what recent film? Hint: most of it takes place in 1950s Brooklyn. The answer is Emory Cohen, who plays Tony Fiorello opposite Saoirse Ronan's memorable Eilis Lacey in the Oscar-nominated film Brooklyn.

Scripted by Nick Hornby and directed by John Crowley, Brooklyn is closely based on Colm Toibin's masterful novel of the same name, but actually improves upon a few key plot-points in the story.

Toibin's Brooklyn, rendered with an Austenesque clarity and a satisfying depth beneath the pale outward forms of his characters, is a wonderfully realized immigrant saga involving the sleepy Irish coastal town of Enniscorthy and the bustling metropolitan New York suburb in the postwar era.

Immigrant sagas tend to make good literature and cinema, because their protagonists are shown making important decisions that affect not only themselves, but also future generations. They take or do not take the fabled road through a yellow wood, a turning that will make all the difference in their lives and those of their children and children's children.

Another riveting family tale that stretches between Ireland and Brooklyn (and back to Ireland) is the bestseller Angela's Ashes by Frank McCourt, which, however, did not fare nearly so well on the big screen: in this case, the book is much better than the movie. I read Angela's Ashes when it first appeared some 20 years ago, and its depiction of truly pathetic characters caught up in bleak fate made an indelible impression. Funny, that I think of it as a novel when it is actually an autobiography-memoir: these genres are close cousins that often seem to meld into one another.

Another bestselling immigrant saga – this time Jewish-themed – that also marks its 20th anniversary this year is The Color of Water, A Black Man's Tribute to His White Mother, by James McBride. This, too, is an autobiography-memoir that is so powerful and so well put together that one might easily remember it as a novel.

The white woman referred to in the subtitle is the former Rachel Deborah Shilsky, who escapes an abusive Jewish home in Suffolk, Va. converts to Christianity, marries a black preacher, and has 12 black children by two husbands. As Ruth McBride, she never says a word about her own painful upbringing while her children are growing up. She tells them she is a "light-skinned" black when they ask why she is a different colour than they are.

"And God? What colour is God?" the children invariably ask.

"God has no colour," she replies. "God is the colour of water."

To their children, their energetic and faith-oriented mother is a mystery. Eventually her son, author James McBride, gets her to talk in depth about her early life. She tells him about her father, a mean-spirited rabbi and shopkeeper, and her mother, a passive, crippled woman with a heart of gold – Polish-Jewish Americans whose stories are heavily inflected with Yiddish and the flavours of the immigrant experience.

McBride's well-crafted, uplifting and, at times, heart-breaking memoir switches in alternating chapters between his own voice and that of his outwardly ordinary yet tremendously inspiring mother. It's true that Jewish characters are painted darkly here but, sadly, it's all in service of the truth – at least as subjectively remembered by Ruth McBride and then filtered into narrative by her son.

Since its publication, The Color of Water has won numerous awards, been translated into 16 languages and sold more than 1.5 million copies. The book made Ruth McBride a celebrity, so much so that the New York Times published a feature obit on her when she died at age 88 in 2010. However, despite the book's popularity, I don't imagine that it would make a good film. Not every story can survive a transplant from the medium of literature to the medium of film.

Another memorable Jewish-themed memoir that fits into this company is The Invisible Wall by Harry Bernstein; its subtitle is "A Love Story That Broke Barriers." Some 10 to 15 years ago, while in his mid- to late-90s, Bernstein wrote a remarkable quartet of memoirs, the first of which, The Invisible Wall, appeared in 2007, when he was 96. (Yes, there is hope for late bloomers who leave their literary aspirations to the last minute.)

Set in a Cheshire mill town on the eve of World War I, The Invisible Wall paints a grimly realistic portrait of his Jewish family, including a father who often drank and gambled away his wages. The Jews live along one side of a street in which an imagined barrier or "invisible wall" separates them from their Christian neighbours on the other side.

Bernstein narrates the story in the first-person as a young child. He recounts how his sister conducts a secret love affair with a Christian boy across the great divide and the immense ramifications of their dramatic Romeo-and-Juliet relationship. It's yet another instance of how an episode from an ordinary family history can become the stuff of great literature.

A more recent title of note is The Boston Girl, a novel by Anita Diamant, author of the popular feminist biblical saga The Red Tent. The Boston Girl focuses on Addie Baum, a child of immigrant parents born in Boston in 1900.

Addie is an 85-year-old narrator who tells her story in the first-person as she looks back on her life. The book describes how a literary-minded American Jewish woman gets educated and finds her own voice and independence.

The Boston Girl is an impressive work, but one in which modern values and sensibilities somehow manage to seep onto the page. That is always the danger when a narrator looks back to a distant past: the sense of immediacy and authenticity may suffer as a result. ■

A celebration of Jewish music for Shabbat Shirah

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Sam Glaser, one of the most recognized names in the North American Jewish music scene, will be in Toronto next weekend as part of Jewish Music Week's Shabbat Shirah celebrations throughout the city.

Since 2011, Jewish Music Week has brought concerts, recitals, lectures, films and other musical events to Toronto to celebrate Jewish music.

Aliza Spiro, artistic director and founder of the non-profit cultural organization, said the weekend-long event, running Jan. 22 to 23, will offer the community some of Toronto's rich cantorial and Jewish musical talent.

The event is organized in honour of Shabbat Shirah, the Sabbath during which the Torah portion tells the story of Moses singing Shirat HaYam, the Song of the Sea, after the Jews crossed the Red Sea to leave Egypt. In honour of the Song of the Sea, this Shabbat is called Shabbat Shirah, the Sabbath of Song.

Spiro, who is married to Beth Tzedec Congregation's Cantor Simon Spiro and has an extensive musical background as a singer and a classically trained pianist, said this event targets anyone who appreciates Jewish music.

"Our audiences are really half and half. They are by no means only Jewish audiences. We extend to every age, every background, every race, every religion – and that has been very nice for us," she said.

"We have a lot of local talent that's really nice to showcase."

There are seven shuls participating in next week's event: Holy Blossom Temple, Beth Tzedec, Temple Kol Ami, Danforth Jewish Circle, Am Shalom Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Adath Israel Congregation.

In addition to special Shabbat services at each of the participating shuls, there will be three upcoming concerts, two of which are free to attend.

For $25 a ticket in advance, people can come to Beth Tzedec on Saturday night to see California-based musician Sam Glaser join Cantor Spiro on stage.

"They'll have on stage the finest vocalists in Toronto, a live nine-piece band, and a special appearance by the Voices of Tomorrow, a children's choir," Aliza Spiro said.

"[Glaser] is a fabulous musician... There is a lot of crap out there, but he is a really good musician," she said with a laugh.

"The whole Shabbat Shirah thing has grown every year. Because I'm married to a cantor, I was aware of all the Shabbat Shirah things that he did at his shul. He always did a full, jam-packed weekend."

Sam Glaser

She said she reached out to other GTA synagogues and offered to help promote related events with the goal of making Jewish music more accessible to more people throughout the city.

"There's a problem that when people think of Jewish music, everyone pigeonholes that term – for some people, Jewish music is all chazzanut, for some people, it's all Hava Nagila, but there are so many different styles available."

Jewish Music Week programs include Sephardi and klezmer music, Holocaust music, Israeli pop, Yiddish theatre, jazz and big band music, as well as cantorial, folk and gospel music.

The following week, on Jan. 28, Jewish Music Week is presenting a free concert called A Night of Broadway and Israeli Music, featuring two local cantors, David Edwards from Beth Emeth and Alex Stein from Adath Israel.

She said in addition to Israeli and Broadway tunes, they'll play some opera and classic rock, and "a little of everything.

"We're really glad that we're able to expose the entire community to this weekend that celebrates Jewish music... It is a really good opportunity for people who are not necessarily synagogue goers, to come to a synagogue... Each one of the performances is about community building. It's bringing people together, and we're happy about it because that really is the goal of Jewish Music Week – to bring people together to celebrate Jewish music." ■

Toronto hockey player coveted by U.S. and Canada

plungen@thecjn.ca

If you check Jake Walman's hockey profile on EliteProspects.com, you'll find his name flanked by the flags of Canada and the United States, each given equal prominence.

Born in Toronto, Walman is also an American citizen through his U.S.-born mother, giving him, like Brett Hull before him, the option of choosing which country to play for.

Of course, only a handful of the very best players ever have to make that kind of decision. Walman, a smooth-skating, high-scoring defenceman with Providence College Friars of the NCAA, was put in that position last summer when the hockey programs from both countries expressed an interest in recruiting him to play at the World Junior Championship in Finland.

"It was a tough decision," Walman acknowledged on the phone from Providence.

He ended up choosing the American team, but the IIHF, the sport's governing body, had other ideas. The IIHF ruled that Walman hadn't played two consecutive years in the United States and was thus ineligible to skate for the American team.

That unfortunate circumstance didn't end Walman's World Junior saga. The Canadian team, looking for a talented, puck-moving defenceman, happily turned to Walman to compete for a spot on the blue line.

"I was just excited to get the call from Canada," Walman said.

He might also have mentioned that the call was unexpected. Very few NCAA players have ever played for the Canadian junior team, which relies almost exclusively on skaters from one of the three Canadian major junior leagues.

But only days before he was set to join 10 other defencemen vying for seven roster spots at a pre-tournament selection camp, Walman suffered a shoulder injury. It wasn't season-ending bad, but it was enough to force the 19-year-old to miss the event.

Meanwhile Canada, which could have used him, finished sixth in the tournament while the United States earned a bronze medal.

If you examine Walman's hockey pedigree, it's no surprise he was courted by the hockey programs of two countries.

So far in 16 games with Providence, he's scored 12 goals and added nine assists for 21 points, tops among NCAA defencemen. With an average scoring rate of 1.31 points per game, he's 16th overall.

Last season, in his first year with the Friars, he scored one goal and added 15 assists, good enough to get him selected by the St. Louis Blues in the third round of the 2014 entry draft, 82nd overall.

A veteran of the Greater Toronto Hockey League (GTHL), Walman advanced through the ranks playing at various times with the Toronto Junior Canadiens, the North York Rangers and the Toronto Red Wings. As a kid, he played on the same team as Connor McDavid, considered a generational player, as well as other high NHL draft picks like Robby Fabbri, Michael Dal Colle, Brendan Lemieux and his buddy and fellow Jew, Joshua Ho-Sang, an Islanders first round pick.

Jake Walman

Walman attended two of the Blues' summer orientation camps, but can't attend their rookie or regular camp without losing his NCAA eligibility.

And with a defence loaded with the likes of Alex Pietrangelo, Jay Bouwmeester and Kevin Shattenkirk, plus highly-touted youngster Colton Parayko, he knows cracking the Blues' lineup will prove a formidable task.

He's up for the challenge. Good as he is, he's constantly trying to improve his game. He considers himself a strong skater who sees the ice well. But to crack a pro lineup, he knows he'll have to get better in his own zone – "having a strong stick, working in the defensive zone before jumping to the offence," he said. And he's been working on his shot for the last year and a half.

"I used to say I like to emulate Erik Karlsson and Morgan Rielly. I might have to switch it up and play a more complete game," he said.

Scoring points has always been one of Walman's strengths. In 2013-14, his first season in the Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL), playing for Toronto Jr. Canadiens, he scored 33 points in 43 games. He was named the OJHL rookie of the year and was a co-recipient of the Canadian Junior Hockey League national Rookie of the Year Award.

In 2014, he represented Team Canada East at the 2014 World Junior A Challenge and then played for the OJHL's South-East Conference all-star team, which finished second at the 2013 Central Canada Cup All-Star Challenge.

When he's asked to name the highlights of his hockey career, none of that comes up. But two other memories do. First was his participation in the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel, when he was part of a gold medal-winning junior team.

"That was probably one of the best experiences of my life," he said. "I didn't know much about Israel. I knew that's where my roots were. To play hockey there was a pretty special experience."

Still, he continued, it was eclipsed by "a special moment" in Philadelphia, when St. Louis selected him in the entry draft, a moment that recognized all he had accomplished in hockey.

With his injury now behind him, Walman is back on the ice, focusing on becoming a better defenceman so he can advance to the next level. A sophomore, he has two years of NCAA eligibility remaining after this season, but he admits his ultimate goal, like the other high-end talents he played with in the GTHL, is to play in the NHL.

Talent and skill are important, he said, "but it's really the compete, the heart, the determination that get you to the next level."

Looking in the mirror, he sees a guy who "never backs down, is relentless, who never gives up," he said.

And at this point, it really doesn't matter which country's flag flies beside your name. ■

Canadian documentary nominated for an Oscar

CJN STAFF AND JTA

A self-financed Canadian documentary, made by first-time, Toronto-based filmmaker Adam Benzine, has been nominated for an Academy Award.

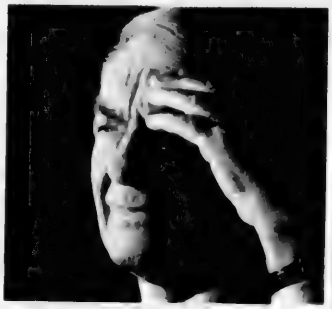
Benzine's 40-minute film, Claude Lanzmann: Spectres of the Shoah, has been nominated in the best documentary short subject category, marking an incredible 12 months for one of the most successful Canadian films of 2015.

Benzine served as the film's writer, producer and director. In addition to its Oscar nomination, the film has been the subject of multiple North American bidding wars, resulting in sales to the CBC and other major broadcasters internationally. The film had its world premiere at Toronto's Hot Docs film festival in April 2015, where it received an honourable mention in the best mid-length documentary category.

In other Oscar news, the Hungarian Holocaust film Son of Saul was nominated for best foreign film.

Son of Saul, which tells the story of a Jewish concentration camp inmate forced to help cremate his fellow prisoners, won the Golden Globe on Jan. 10 for best foreign language film.

Other Jewish Oscar nominees include Steven Spielberg, producer and director of Bridge of Spies, which made the short list for best picture. The film, which tells the story of a Cold War prisoner exchange, is based on a screenplay by filmmaker brothers Joel and Ethan Coen.



Claude Lanzmann is the subject of Adam Benzine's Oscar-nominated documentary.

Also in the running is Israel-born super producer Arnon Milchan, whose Leonardo DiCaprio thriller The Revenant is in contention for best picture.

Jennifer Jason Leigh was nominated as best supporting actress for her role in the The Hateful Eight, about eight strangers seeking refuge from a blizzard during the American Civil War.

The documentary Amy, about the British Jewish singer Amy Winehouse, was nominated for best documentary.

The announcements were made last week in a ceremony in Los Angeles. The 88th Academy Awards ceremony will be held Feb. 28 in Los Angeles. ■

Phyllis Lambert wins 'Israeli Nobel'

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Montreal architect and urban heritage activist Phyllis Lambert is this year's winner of Israel's $100,000 (US) Wolf Prize for the Arts. She was cited for her six decades of championing innovation in building design and preservation of properties of patrimonial significance, as well as invigorating the profession and research into architecture.

Lambert, founder of the Canadian Centre for Architecture (CCA) in 1989, is among seven recipients of the 2016 Wolf Prizes, working in five fields, mostly the sciences and medicine.

The prizes will be presented in June by Israeli President Reuven Rivlin in a ceremony at the Knesset.

In announcing the laureates on Jan. 13, the Wolf Foundation described Lambert's fearless and multi-faceted role over a long period.

"Playing all possible roles of designer, planner, artist, writer, photographer, curator, museum director, patron and philanthropist, she ultimately stands for professional rigour and esthetic elegance, but also for intellectual doubt and political critique.

"From the mid-1950s to the present, she has been vigorously involved in the realization of seminal innovative buildings, exemplary urban preservation and regeneration projects and leading architectural research institutes."

Lambert, now founding director emeritus of the CCA, said, "I am thrilled to be the recipient of the highly esteemed Wolf Prize for the arts. It is a superb consummation for decades of passionate work."

Phyllis Lambert

Lambert, 88, launched her career in the 1950s when her father, distiller Samuel Bronfman, entrusted her with overseeing the design of the Seagram building in New York, whose chief architect was the famous Mies van der Rohe.

The awards have been dubbed the country's Nobel Prize or the "pre-Nobel" because a significant number of laureates have gone on to win the Nobel Prize.

Lambert is the 11th Canadian to win a Wolf Prize, and only one other, Frank Gehry, has been for architecture, an arts category that rotates every four years among music, painting and sculpture.

"Every day from my office window at Westmount Square – a modernist gem designed by Mies van der Rohe, an architect introduced to North America by Ms. Lambert – I thank her for her outstanding contribution to Montreal's architectural heritage," said Consul General Ziv Nevo Kulman. ■

A kids' Holocaust story with a difference

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Last Train, A Holocaust Story, the latest book by Rona Arato, is based on the memories of her husband, Paul Auslander, about his family's horrific journey from Hungary after they were forced from ghetto to work camps to Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, and finally to the death train from which they were miraculously saved.

Arato, author of 15 fiction and non-fiction children's books, winner of the Norman Fleck Award for children's non-fiction and many other awards, told The CJN that Paul was five years old when the Nazis occupied his hometown of Karcag in Hungary in April 1944. For the next year, Paul, his 11-year-old brother, Oscar, and his ailing mother endured the atrocities of the Holocaust.

After the war, the family returned to Hungary, where Paul's father was a high school teacher. The country was then under Soviet rule, and the family name was changed from Auslander, which is German, to Arato, because the Communist government insisted that teachers have Hungarian names.

Paul escaped to Canada after the Hungarian Revolution of 1956.

Arato said her husband hesitated to speak about his childhood memories until the spring of 2008 when he stumbled upon photographs on his computer of the train from which thousands of Jewish prisoners, including his own family, were saved more than 60 years earlier.

"The picture on the screen showed a woman running toward a camera, arms outstretched, her face a mask of surprise. What caught my husband's attention was in the backdrop – the abandoned freight train," Arato said.

Two American soldiers were on a reconnaissance mission in Germany, she explained, when they drove their tank out of the forest and found the abandoned train filled with 2,500 prisoner-survivors from Bergen-Belsen.

"The German guards had dropped their guns and run off. The [American] men called for backup, and the soldiers in their division got the people off the train and took care of them."

Matt Rozell, a high school teacher in Hudson Falls, N.Y., posted the pictures on the computer when he started a living history project on the saving of the Jews on the abandoned train.

Rozell was planning a reunion of the soldiers and the survivors, and he asked them to contact him. The Aratos responded, and subsequently attended the reunion at Rozell's high school in Hudson Falls.

Arato, who lives in Toronto, is a sought-after speaker on human rights issues including discrimination, bullying, slavery, genocide and immigration. From 1994 to 1998, she interviewed Holocaust survivors for Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

Recently, Arato did a presentation to Alberta schools in Lethbridge, Medicine Hat and Calgary. "I basically conducted my own Holocaust Education Week," she said. "Most of the students are Christian, and their reception to the book is amazing."

The Last Train is only the second non-fiction book to ever win a Rocky Mountain Book Award. The other was Hana's Suitcase by Karen Levine.

"I introduce these subjects to children in a careful way that they can relate to and understand in the context of their own lives," Arato said.

"Paul became ill while I was writing The Last Train and passed away three months after it was published. He was at the launch and was very proud of the book."

Although The Last Train, A Holocaust Story was written for children and students, it can be appreciated by adult readers who can visualize the events of the Holocaust through the eyes of young survivors. ■

Cooking and baking with fruit for Tu b'Shvat

SYBIL KAPLAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It will soon be Tu b'Shvat – on Jan. 25, this year – and the fruits that are now in season in Israel are apples, persimmons, some strawberries (although beautiful, they are expensive) and several varieties of oranges.

One usually thinks of dates, figs and carob for Tu b'Shvat, the fruits of Eretz Yisrael, but for variety, here are some recipes using oranges and nectarines.

Orange juice salad dressing

- ❑ 3/4 cup oil
- ❑ 6 tbsp. orange juice
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. sugar
- ❑ pinch dry mustard

Combine oil, orange juice, sugar and mustard in a jar. Shake well. Good on salad with lettuce, avocado and grapefruit.

Syrian orange chicken

- ❑ 1 tbsp. margarine
- ❑ 1 tbsp. oil
- ❑ 1 cut-up chicken
- ❑ 1/2 cup orange juice
- ❑ 1 cup chicken soup
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. corn starch
- ❑ 1/2 chopped onion
- ❑ juice of 1/2 lemon
- ❑ 6-9 halved, pitted dates
- ❑ orange slices

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a baking dish. Heat margarine and oil in a frying pan and brown chicken. Place in the baking dish.

Add orange juice, chicken soup, corn starch, onion and lemon juice to frying pan and cook, stirring, until sauce thickens. Pour over chicken.

Cover and bake in preheated oven 45 minutes. Garnish with dates and orange slices, cover, and bake at least 15 minutes or until chicken is done. Good served with rice. Makes 4 servings.

Nectarine spice cake

- ❑ 6 seeded, peeled, cut-up nectarines
- ❑ 1/3 cup canola oil
- ❑ 3 eggs
- ❑ 1 cup brown sugar
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. ginger
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 1 3/4 cups flour
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 1/2 cup non-dairy creamer

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a cake pan or two loaf pans, or place mini-papers in a mini-muffin pan and spray with vegetable spray.

Place nectarine pieces, oil, eggs and brown sugar in a mixer or food processor and blend a few seconds.

Add ginger, cinnamon, vanilla, flour, baking powder and non-dairy creamer and blend.

Spoon into baking pans. Bake in preheated oven 25 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean.

For a larger quantity, you can double the recipe. ■

GUEST VOICE

Five things about raising older boys I didn't expect

Mayim Bialik

My boys are seven and 10, and so many of the troubles of being a mom of young kids are finally over now, thank goodness! But as they say, small kids small problems, big kids big problems.

Here are the top five astounding things I didn't realize older kids would end up doing:

Call You Out On Your Crap: When I used to lose my mind and use a loud "outside" voice because I lost my patience and could not fathom negotiating whatever it was I had to negotiate, my kids would typically cry or clam up, or have some other reaction that would make me feel horrible. Then, I would apologize and call a friend or a mentor and ask why I am such a bad mom. And then we would move on.

Now that my kids are older, they call me out on that crap. They'll say things like, "Why are you yelling? That's not cool." Or, "You're so frustrating, Mom!" And I'm not implying that they are being sassy or disrespectful. They simply are old enough to have conversations about how you treat them in ways that are very sobering.

Tell On You: In a similar and related vein, they are now old enough to tell the other parents on you. It doesn't matter that I'm divorced. In particular, my older son makes it very clear to let his dad know right in front of me that I yelled at him. God love my ex, he usually just stares at me while saying to our son, "OK."

Have Very Strong Opinions About Clothing: I have always dressed my boys snazzily just because it's in my genes to like vests and blazers and argyle socks, even if you are dressing a tiny person. I guess it caught on, because my boys now like dressing this way. Unfortunately, this has become more of an issue as they get older, not less. It's not just girls who are picky about clothes, apparently. Right down to the Target T-shirt they wear, both of my boys feel a strong need to vote on every item of clothing in a way I never anticipated them doing.

Defend Each Other: A lot of times, I'm far from perfect as a mom. Sometimes, I raise my voice or make bad mama decisions. It happens. Often it's because I am stressed out and have not replenished my resources and I end up being rude or snarky or snippy with my poor kids. But something that happens with older kids is that they defend each other when you're not being kind to one of them in a big or small way.

For example, if I ask Firstborn to stop playing piano and clean up his room, Little Man will see how upset Firstborn is and say, "Let him play, Mama!" Or if I yell (argh, of course I sometimes do) at one, the other one will say, "Stop yelling!" and that stops me in my tracks. It makes me feel really trapped because it's like always potentially battling two people instead of one, but mostly it makes me feel thrilled that they care enough for each other's welfare that they want to take care of each other this way.

Pull Away: It happens. It's already started happening. It's normal. It's biological. It's OK. It has to be OK. I feel like I am being given the choice every time I am with them: either be the mom who's cool with the changes and just roll with them, or point out to them at every opportunity how rejected and lonely I feel without their cuddles and constant love and be that mom.

I'm trying to roll with it all. When we are alone, I get more attention than when we are in public. And now I'm finding new ways to make my boys laugh and entertain them, because my hugs and kisses aren't enough anymore. Time to watch movies together–but not cuddle too much or too close–and time to let them explore being young men.

I can do it all, right? If I can carry them for 40 weeks in my belly, I can do all of this. If I can give birth to them and nurse them and hold them every time they cried and make everything better every minute God gave me, I can mother older boys, right? ■

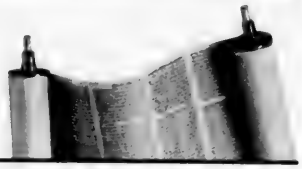
Beshalach | Exodus 13:17-17:16



Rabbi Aaron Katchen reflects on the role of trees in our tradition ahead of Tu b'Shvat
Rabbi Michal Shekel argues that we shouldn't wait for God to do everything for us
Rabbi Howard Morrison examines the connection between unity and diversity

Aaron Katchen

"Blessed are You... Ruler of the universe, who did not leave anything lacking in His world and created in it goodly creatures and goodly trees to give pleasure to people" (blessing from the siddur).

Happy New Year, trees. In a couple of days, we will celebrate Tu b'Shvat, the New Year for the trees. This holiday originally related to the Temple in Jerusalem and the taxation and usage of trees. The day has since been reinterpreted and re-contextualized throughout the millennia, from the Kabbalists to the Zionists, to the environmentalists.

Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kook, son of the first chief rabbi of pre-state Israel, provides an interesting insight into trees and our tradition. He juxtaposes the blessing cited above (that is said in the springtime, upon seeing a blossoming tree in the Jewish month of Nissan), with a story found in the Mishnah (Avot 3:9): "Rabbi Yacov taught: one who is reviewing their [Torah] studies while walking along the way and interrupts their study to exclaim, 'How splendid this tree is!' 'How fair this field is!' Scripture considers it as if they have forfeited their soul."

It would initially seem that Rabbi Yacov views anything that separates a person from the study of Torah to be a distraction. But the younger Rabbi Kook has a different response. He believes Rabbi Yacov is warning against compartmentalization and separation, from separating our inner spiritual life of Torah from our connection to the wonders of the world, and vice versa. We need to integrate the beauty of nature – "How splendid this tree is" – within the context of Torah. We need to recognize that this natural beauty appears within Torah and through it. For the Torah itself is called a "tree of life for all who hold to it" (Proverbs 3:18). ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen, who is based in Toronto, directs Ask Big Questions Canada in partnership with Hillel.

Michal Shekel

Parshat Beshalach provides the climax of an immense struggle – our God versus Egypt's supreme deity, personified by Pharaoh. We know the result as, having crossed the Sea of Reeds, we sing of God's might. Throughout Beshalach, we witness God's feats that provide us with security and sustenance.

There is an additional message in the parshah that we are slow to learn. It occurs as we face the Sea of Reeds with the Egyptians closing in on us. Moses exhorts us to be courageous and trust in God's power and protection. Yet God has a surprising response for Moses: "Why do you cry out to Me? Tell the Israelites to go forward" (Exodus 14:15). Moses is told to raise his arm and hold out his staff so that the sea will part.

Surely this choreography isn't necessary in order for God to perform wonders! "Why do you cry out to Me?" is a lesson as to what is expected of us: don't wait for God to do everything for you. It is a nudge toward independence for a newly freed people who are used to having every aspect of their life controlled.

Old habits die hard. Experiencing a miraculous crossing is not enough for us. We proceed to grumble about a lack of food and water. Lo and behold, God provides. But in order to turn the bitter waters of marah into a sweet elixir, Moses must toss a piece of wood into it. When given manna, we must collect it according to specific guidelines. Still later, God instructs Moses to strike a rock to produce water. In each instance there is an additional step that requires human action.

As we slowly march away from the Sea of Reeds, we begin to learn that maintaining freedom requires our active participation. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ont.

Howard Morrison

Parshat Beshalach celebrates the miracle of the Exodus from Egypt. The song of deliverance and the crossing of the Sea of Reeds are contained in this portion. I marvel when scientific questions are posed about events portrayed in the Torah. One obvious question is how could hundreds of thousands of Israelites begin crossing the sea at one point and end up at the same finishing point?

A midrash suggests that when the Israelites were in the midst of the crossing the sea, each tribe was gathered unto itself in a glass-like transparent structure. In this way, each tribe could look through and keep itself in close proximity to all the other tribes. Homiletically, this explains how all the tribes of Israel came out together as one.

There are many lessons in this midrash. While each tribe was autonomous, each saw itself as being connected to a larger definition of peoplehood. So, too, throughout Jewish history, our peoplehood has expressed itself through ideological, cultural, and geographical diversity. In the best of times, however, the unity of our people has been blessed by the richness of its diversity. Today, Klal Yisrael is enriched by Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews whose diversity is based on custom, culture and geography. Klal Yisrael is also enriched by the ideological diversity of serious Jews, be they affiliated with Reform, Reconstructionist, Conservative or Orthodox branches of Judaism.

A couple of days after Shabbat Shirah, when the Exodus narrative is read, we will celebrate Tu b'Shvat. My hope and prayer is that all segments of the Jewish People will see themselves as did the tribes of Israel during the crossing of the sea, in transparent structures, so that we may converse with each other and stay close to each other. All Jews are branches on an Etz Chaim, a tree of life, whose foundation is rooted in God, Torah and Israel. ■

Rabbi Howard Morrison is senior rabbi – Mara D'Atra at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Mark Rosenblum: peace advocate sees hope amid grim Mideast realities

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Mark Rosenblum is the founder of Americans for Peace Now (APN), sister organization of Shalom Achshav, which APN describes as Israel's pre-eminent peace movement. Rosenblum is a historian and professor at Queens College of the City University of New York, where he's also director of the Center for Jewish Studies, the Center for Ethnic, Racial and Religious Understanding and the Michael Harrington Center for Democratic Values and Social Change.

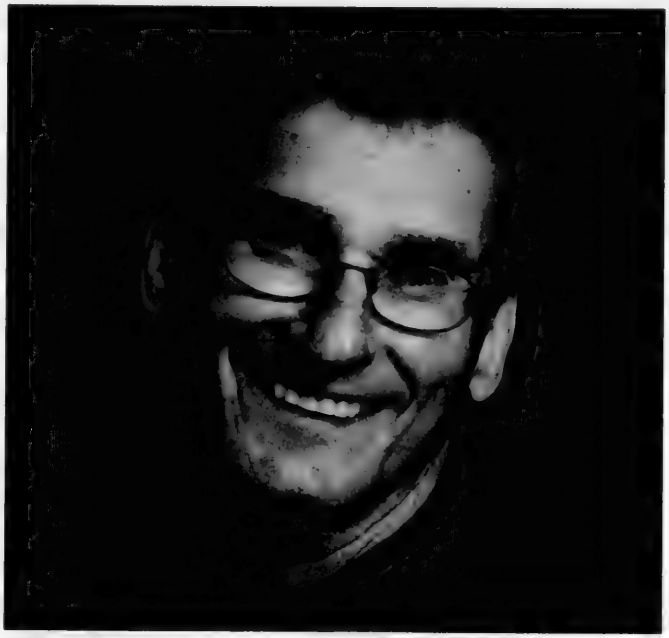
Rosenblum was in Toronto and Ottawa last fall to speak about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict at events sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

What sorts of things did you speak about during your visit to Canada?

I talked about where hope resides in the present disastrous, cynical moment, and about needing to oppose ignoring the uphill struggle that people who believe in Israel will need to go through to make peace in a region that's imploding – a region with a Palestinian people who are divided ideologically and territorially. I also addressed the need to look at the harsh realities, but not give up hope, because in my mind there are elements of hope.

More specifically, I talked about the three fires burning right now in the Middle East:

- The local fire: Israel and Palestine. Jerusalem is burning. It's leaderless. We have an Israeli prime minister who has no vision of a way out and who wouldn't be willing to implement it if he did, and a Palestinian leader who seems to be lost, standing on one leg. Jerusalem is filled with terror and violence – the kind that has frightened Israelis and created a toxic environment.
- The regional fire: the great unraveling of the modern Middle East. The Arab state system is imploding. States are disintegrating, like Syria. In this vacuum of flailing states in the Arab/Muslim world, you have other forces that seem irredeemably monstrous led by the so-called Islamic State.
- The global fire: we have international institutions that aren't up to the job of managing, much less resolving, the local Israeli-Palestinian and regional conflicts, and the makings of a revived battle between blocs that could lead to a revived Cold War – Russia as a renewed power, working hand and glove with the Iranians.



Mark Rosenblum

Given all of this, do you believe a two-state solution is still feasible?

I think it's possible, but it won't happen by the two parties alone pulling themselves out of the mud and the blood. I don't think Israel and Palestine at this juncture have the will, capacity or leadership to make a substantive breakthrough on negotiating a permanent peace or two-state solution.

I say that right now, we have a four-state solution. We have Israel, then we have Israel's carving out of Judea and Samaria – this is in part with international recognition and in part a de facto annexation – and then we have two Palestinian entities that are enemies: one controlled by Hamas in Gaza and one by the Palestinian Authority in parts of the West Bank.

If anyone's in favour of a two-state solution, they'll have to engage in strange mathematics to get there. They'll have to subtract the Jewish de facto sub-state in the West Bank and have the Palestinians accept Israel and have a single Palestinian entity governing Gaza and the West Bank.

I think [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu and [Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud] Abbas don't simply lack the will to negotiate peace, I think for almost two years now, both have seen the price they'll have to pay for peace as too high and are just trying to manage the status quo and play the blame game.

> I think [two states are] possible, but it won't happen by the two parties alone pulling themselves out of the mud and the blood.

The local level is pretty grim, and the regional and international actors will have to intervene to make a difference.

I've talked about the Arab League peace initiative, which has been around since 2002, and about why it hasn't had traction and why it's not impossible

We ought to be looking at who the states and movements are who could actually change the Israel-Palestinian situation from its downward spiral of death. The Arab League peace initiative is a fascinating causeway to negotiate certain issues. It's possible Abbas will only move in the direction of peace in a regional context. He's lost the trust of a large segment of the Palestinian population and will need to have the cover of someone else from the Arab world with substance, influence and money in the international region to propose things. These proposals don't have to come from Israel or even the United States.

It's often argued in the pro-Israel camp that the Palestinian leadership isn't a viable peace partner. Do you think Abbas wants peace?

I think he wants peace, but in recent history in particular, he hasn't demonstrated that he's willing to make peace under terms necessary for both sides, and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hasn't either.

We can go back to the historical moment of 2008. The narrative is that Abbas walked away from the best offer imaginable – made by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert – which even would have created an international body responsible for the sovereign rule of Jerusalem. I would say there's some truth to that narrative, but on the other hand, Abbas had his own domestic politics to consider.

Olmert was a standing corpse politically when he made the offer. He was under multiple investigations for crime, several of which would have driven him out of office. I'm not making excuses for Abbas, but I'm using what I've been told by interlocutors from negotiations that Abbas didn't have good incentive to sign this deal, because he wasn't going to get the benefits, that the prime minister wouldn't have been in power to implement it.

I'd still say that, at the end of the day, Abbas wants peace on his terms, and so far, he's not accepted the most generous peace deal the Israelis have offered.

Is the North American media biased against Israel, in your opinion?

I'd say, in general, it depends what you read. Israel has a much more problematic set of optics to cope with than the other side. For example, during the last Gaza war and the one before it, you had body bags in the four figures on the Palestinian side and less dead on the Jewish side.

The optics made it look like the Israelis are the perpetrators and the Palestinians are completely innocent victims. Of course, the reality is much more complicated. Palestinians have launched thousands of rockets at Israel.

But for the public that watches the body bag count and some of the more atrocious killings of Palestinians, particularly of non-combatants, it creates a visual that tends to put blame on the Israelis. ■

Sergei Eisenstein's continuing legacy: Orwell to The Hobbit

Backstory

EROL ARAF

Sergei Eisenstein's iconic but unfinished film Que Viva Mexico features captivating footage of the Mexican holiday called Dia de los Muertos (Day of the Dead), when the deceased are honoured in public fiestas.

In a carnival of masked skeletons, macabre dances are performed with vampires in a state of trance, Lucifer waltzes with young maidens and the Archangel tangos with risen apparitions dressed in bowler hats and white bow ties. The children eat sugar skulls and candy marigolds, "the flowers of death" in Mexican folklore. The black and white images of the festival of the dead convey a visual current of seduction where pleasure and death intersect. Eisenstein succeeds in giving visual expression to Gustave Flaubert's reveries in Temptation of Saint Antony, where "Death sniggers, Lust roars. They take each other by the waist and together sing."

These images provide the "material" for the magnificent tableau of the opening scene of Sam Mendes' latest James Bond film, Specter, which takes place during the Day of the Dead in Mexico City. Agent 007, wearing a death mask, naturally accompanied by a ravishingly beautiful lady and on a deadly mission, successfully resists the temptation of Eros and decides that, after all, business comes before pleasure on the Day of the Dead. But on the streets, the revelries of the departed beloved are pure Eisenstein in colour.

Eisenstein was Stalin's favourite cinematographer, and on the eve of World War II, the two agreed to make an eponymous movie about Alexander Nevsky, the revered Muscovite hero who crushed the invading Teutonic Iron Knights on the frozen Lake Peipus in 1242. In the movie's epic Battle of the Ice scene, set to music by Prokofiev, the German knights, resembling Tolkien's warmongers, wear bucket helmets with slits in the form of a cross for their eyes, while their leaders have even more outlandish helmets, with stag's horns or eagle wings and claws on either side.

The clash of steel and flesh in the gigantic Battle of the Ice is brilliantly choreographed - clearly influenced by Uccello's Battle of San Romano - and continues to resonate in the works of many famous directors ranging from Orson Welles' Chimes at Midnight to Laurence Olivier's Henry V. But it is the special effects in the final scene of Alexander Nevsky where the thin ice on the lake gives way beneath the heavy weight of Teutonic armour under a soulless iron sky – a scene digitally replicated in Peter Jackson's The Hobbit: Battle of the Five Armies – that we appreciate the scope of Eisenstein's reach beyond the grave in fermenting the imagination of the greatest film makers of our time.

In the penultimate scene of The Hobbit: The Battle of the Five Armies, the Dwarf King Thorin confronts the evil Orc Azog on an icy lake on the edge of a frozen waterfall in the mountain lair of the Dark Forces. Azog swings his chain-bound boulder to flay the Good King but with every missed stroke landing with a devastating thud on the ice, the frosty surface beneath the monster's feet is weakened. Eventually, the frozen lake starts cracking slowly and Azog, like the Teutonic Knights, is slowly swallowed by icy swirls.

According to his biographer, Ronald Bergan, Eisenstein was "not only the most imaginative practitioner of his art but also its principal theorist." The appeal of his iconic films featuring the revolutionary application of the concept of "dynamic montage" endures 67 years after his death. From his celebrated movie The Battleship Potemkin with its unforgettable Odessa Steps sequence, to the Muscovite splendours of Ivan the Terrible; from his visual symphony Que Viva Mexico to Alexander Nevsky's special effects, his films are still watched, his visual concepts are emulated and reconfigured by many gifted directors who are inspired by his imagination without borders.

Eisenstein was one of the towering Jewish minds of global cinematography. His epitaph is projected on thousands of silver screens the world over to this day. ■

Campers learn life skills in their summers away

MARILYN LAZAR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

If you're considering camp for your kids but wonder if it will be a positive experience or worth the substantial cost, look no further.

Below is a curated collection of direct quotes, answering the question 'what life skills did you learn at camp?'

One camper said, "There are so many. The ones that stand out for me are: being independent, having to advocate for oneself, respecting others, co-operation, making new friends and the importance of trying new things."

Another said, "you learn about having fun and losing inhibition, about unleashing your imagination and creativity; about camaraderie and building life-long friendships through shared experiences; about new activities whether water sports, scouting, arts and crafts and/or drama; about joy in simplicity; about nature; if it is a Jewish camp, about Judaism and Zionism."

Here are some other answers:

"Hospital corners."

"How to sweep a floor and use a dustpan."

"How to plant a garden, light a one-match fire, cook dinner over a campfire, and get along with other kids."

"I learned to live in a tent, share one plug among four people and fend off raccoons."

"I learned to appreciate my mother's cooking."

"How to overcome little fears. My first year I peed in my bed because it was raining and I was scared of the dark. That didn't happen again."

"Little boys learn to shower properly and general bathroom hygiene."

"Finding solutions."

"You learn to develop and maintain deep bonds. I didn't see my camp friends as often as I did my school friends, but we marched at each other's weddings and we're still close today."

"Things get imprinted on you: certain moments, like the camp play. Even the buildings have huge meaning. Like remembering what you did in a particular building."

"First kiss?"

"How great it feels to win an award."

"Camp nurtures kids and fosters skills. I know professional potters and musicians who honed their talent at camp."

"Independence. Kids are valued for hilarity and behaviour that might not be tolerated in a classroom. They get to be themselves."

"You develop people skills and learn to solve problems. Throw 12 kids into a room – try that with adults in a board room. You learn team work and independence. One counsellor is not always able to help the way a parent might."

"Looking back, I can see the seeds of who people grew into. I didn't know as a 10-year-old what that kid running around like an idiot would do as an adult, but as you watch each other grow up and start careers, it makes sense. That brilliant but quirky kid who didn't say much but when he did it was relevant is a lawyer today. The guy who was always ready to dive into the dirt works with his hands. The extrovert owns a video production company."

It seems that whatever the experience kids have at camp, it becomes a memory that lasts a lifetime. ■

Camp Bilium builds Jewish leaders of the future

Since 1951, Camp Biluim Canada, Canadian Young Judaea's National Leadership Institute, has welcomed a new group of more than 100 sixteen year-olds from across Canada, the United States and Israel to their site each year, for a truly transformative summer.

Camp Biluim is more than just your typical summer camp. It is an immersive, leadership experience with a curriculum built around providing campers with the confidence and skills to become leaders within their respective communities, while participating in active and fun recreational activities and making friendships that last a lifetime.

The philosophy at Camp Biluim is that everyone has the potential to become a great leader, and that each and every camper has something unique to bring to the "chevrah" (society). Through a variety of both staff and camper-led programming, skill development, and hadrachah (leadership) sessions, Camp Biluim's goal is to ensure that every camper who takes part in the six-week, overnight program, has the proper skills and feels empowered to become a leader. Along with extensive leadership training, Camp Biluim also empowers campers to strengthen their relationship to Israel, and develop a stronger sense of their Jewish selves within a supportive, safe, and nurturing environment.

Situated on the shores of Lac Mercier in beautiful Mont Tremblant, Quebec, Camp Biluim Canada makes up 28 acres of land including a tent site, sports field, baseball diamond, two rec halls, dining hall, yoga and dance studio, arts and crafts studio, music room, recording studio, infirmary, swimming docks, archery range, boating docks, basketball courts, beach, and kilometres of beautiful trails through the forest for both hiking and biking. Campers at Camp Biluim are encouraged to try as many activities as possible throughout the summer, including Red Cross certified swim instruction, fitness, tripping, biking, yoga, glee club, radio show, archery, cooking, music, boating, spoken word, land and watersports, arts and crafts, nature, and drama, to name a few.

What truly sets Camp Biluim apart from other camps, however, is the hadrachah (leadership) program, a facilitated session with a group of up to 12 peers and two leaders, which takes place daily.

The program's curriculum is specifically modelled to create a safe space in which campers can confront themselves and their fears, grow as individuals and as a group, and empower one another.

Combined with many other diverse leadership opportunities, the hadrachah program is a unique and individualized experience for every camper, and creates an extremely tight bond between campers and staff members alike. As a leadership camp, Biluim prides itself on providing campers with additional daily opportunities to get involved in camp life and to exercise their leadership skills. These include camper-run programs, the Big Brother/Big Sister program, CIT "shadow a staff member" program, tripper-in-training program, and many more. Some of these are required as part of the program, and some are optional, based on camper interest. Camp Biluim Canada is happy to provide their campers with high school volunteer hours for their time spent on leadership initiatives at camp. ■

Camp Massad enters 70th season

There is significant "quantitative evidence that summers at Jewish camp create adults who are committed to the Jewish community and engaged in Jewish practice" (see www.jewishcamp.org/research). Those who attended Jewish camp were 30 per cent more likely to donate to a Jewish charity, 37 per cent more likely to light Shabbat candles, 45 per cent more likely to attend synagogue monthly or more, and 55 per cent more likely to be very emotionally attached to Israel.

Jeff Bicher, the director of Camp Massad could not agree more. "It is clear that our campers develop a connection to the community and to each other, like nothing else. Our tagline, Where Going to Camp Means Coming Home, just says it all." Which is why after a 10-year hiatus, Jeff went back to camp this past summer. When asked how long this stint will be, his face beamed. "I can't imagine spending my summers anywhere else. That magical place is responsible for so much.

"I owe Camp Massad a debt of gratitude. Not only did Massad expose my spiritual and spirited sides and enable me to form some great friendships, but Camp Massad brought me my wife, and as a result my family, giving me the ultimate gift of happiness and fulfilment. And my story is not the only one like this." Entering its 70th season, the camp is proud to be serving another generation of Massadniks, including grandchildren of its original counsellors and campers.

Situated on Lac Quenouille 115 kilometres north of Montreal, Camp Massad was founded in 1947 to offer children an opportunity to enrich their knowledge of Jewish culture, and their fluency in the Hebrew language, while enjoying an integrated and extensive camping program. The camp seeks to ensure that every camper enjoys a fun, safe, and nurturing summer through meaningful Jewish experiences rooted in a Shabbat-observant and Zionist environment. Campers are embraced into the Massad family, all the while being enveloped by its Ruach (spirit) and Massoret Massad (traditions). Through quality programming, campers benefit from individualized attention and focused skill development, taking pride in their accomplishments. In this inclusive community, campers and staff will form lifelong relationships and are inspired to live a Jewish life.

Massad is based on a set five core values which are shared and lived year-round.

- Dati: Observing and celebrating Shabbat and mitzvot
- Massoret Ve'Ruach: continuing and honouring the Massad traditions and its rich, distinct atmosphere
- Tzionut: strengthening the love for and commitment to Israel, Jewish culture and the Hebrew language
- Chevrut: fostering an environment where lifelong friendships are nurtured, and creating a sense of family and unity within camp;
- Hatzlacha Ve'Tzmicha: committing to create quality programs that enrich and challenge participants to grow and excel, to strive for success and flourish, appreciating that we are creating tomorrow's leaders.

Bicher will be returning to Massad for his 24th summer. He was first hired to direct camp for the 1997 season, when there were just 52 campers. Within four years, camp was at capacity. He attributes the success back then, and the current resurgence, to multiple factors, including great staff teams and superb volunteer leaders. ■

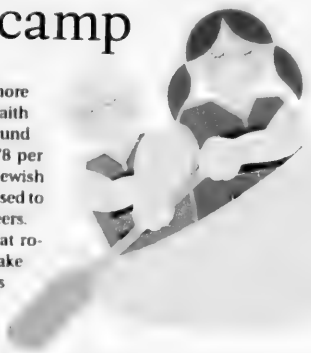
Dating and marriage a result of Jewish camp



MAAYAN JAFFE
JNS.ORG

Eighteen-year-old Bernie Kozlovksy spent from sundown to sunrise on a boat with 16-year-old Sonia Rosenbaum in the summer of 1972.

"We talked until dawn," Kozlovksy recalls about that summer at a Jewish summer camp.

Kozlovksy worked in the camp kitchen. Rosenbaum was a camper. From that summer forward, neither dated another individual. Forty-three years later – including 39 years of marriage, six children, and seven grandchildren – Kozlovksy attributes his successful relationship to the spark that formed during his summertime experience.

Not much has changed.

Today, the (camp) fire is still burning at Jewish summer camp. Dating and marriage are byproducts of summers spent banging on the table during Birkat Hamazon, engaging in loud and intense games of colour war, and celebrating Jewish culture with Hebrew plays and folk music campfire sing-alongs.

No one is pushed to date at Jewish summer camp, explains Lauren Ben-Shoshan, who met her Israeli husband, Alon, as a counsellor at a Union for Reform Judaism camp in 2004. The couple now lives in Israel.

"Camp is a positive place for Jewish learning, physical activity, and connecting with the outdoors. No one wants campers to feel bad because they didn't find their spouse when they were 15, 19, or 22. But there is a covert understanding that [marriage is] a nice byproduct of Jewish summer camp, when it happens," says Ben-Shoshan, who is also a Jewish educator.

It occurs more often than many realize. According to Camp Works, a report released in 2012 by the Foundation for Jewish Camp, Jewish adults who attend Jewish overnight camp are on average 10 per cent more likely to marry within the Jewish faith than their peers. A 2000-01 study found that number to be higher, with 78 per cent of individuals who attended Jewish summer camp in-married, as opposed to 62 per cent of their non-camper peers.

What's the secret sauce? Is it that romantic Shabbat at sunset by the lake or in the secluded woods? That's part of it, but it is more likely a result of the "intensity" of the camp experience, Ben-Shoshan believes.

"You're living with everyone. The days last forever, but camp feels like it only lasts a minute. So even if camp is only two months, these are two very intense months," she says. "You see the campers and counsellors in stressful situations, how they interact with peers and with the kids, the meals, how they interact with co-workers. It is all these things that happen in life, that could take several months in the 'real world,' you see within a week at camp."

Jewish summer camp focuses heavily on community-building, notes Aaron Bogage, who attended the BBYO International Leadership Training Conference for several summers and now works at the overnight BBYO Chapter Leadership Training Conference.

He says there are always "quite a few couples per session," explaining that these relationships form because everyone is "extremely open" with each other and open to meeting new people.

"Everyone is genuinely excited to get to know the rest of the teens....There is a sense of community that comes from camp," Bogage says.

One can start to pinpoint new couples, according to Bogage, by looking at who sits where during meals and what campers do during free time. Bogage has not met his significant other through camp, but his good friend met a girl last summer. They are still together despite the physical distance between them.

Jen Silber, executive director of a Habonim Dror camp, says there is a focus at camp on building healthy peer relationships.

"We want [campers] to learn about communication, how to express their needs in relationships, feel confident being themselves and develop trust," she says.

Silber, who met her own husband as a camper and then staffer, argues that friendships and romantic relationships that people form at summer camp tend to be "deeper" and more authentic than those forged at school or in other environments. Campers and counsellors feel accepted for who they are, she says.

Likewise, people who attend Jewish summer camps tend to share similar values. Through the camping experience, they come to learn how they hope to celebrate Shabbat or even raise their children.

"My husband and I come at life from a similar place of what is important and what we want for our children in terms of Jewish identity and connection to Israel," says Silber. "And it's fun. Camp is really fun and that playfulness, that energy or ruach (spirit) is still there in our relationship today."

That's exactly how it has gone for Mollie Gansky, who met her boyfriend, Corey Bass, at Camp Ramah in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains. She spent seven summers as a camper and five as a counsellor. She knew her boyfriend since she was young, but they only started dating as staffers. Now 23, she says she and Bass are on the same page about the role of Judaism in their lives, which makes the relationship stronger.

But Gansky also describes the pressure at camp to "hook up" or at minimum, have your first kiss. She had hers in 2006.

"I had a boyfriend at camp for two years as a camper," Gansky recalls. "Within my age group, there were at least seven or eight relationships each year. Those were the serious relationships, but there were just hookups, too."

As a counsellor, Gansky says she observed that campers engaged in relationships starting as early as fourth or fifth grade, with campers "coupling off" for dates to the annual fireworks displays or other events. In seventh or eighth grade, the pressure grows, and by ninth or 10th grade, she says, "campers have a lot of pressure to find someone, to be with someone at camp."

Jen and Dan Silber met at Camp Moshava.

Camp Ramah walls are adorned with plaques with kissy faces on which people etch their name and the date of their first kiss. More than 3,000 couples have their plaques featured on "shidduch walls" at Ramah camps around the country (Wisconsin, the Berkshires, and California). At Ramah in the Poconos, a gazebo called Gazebo Zugot (Hebrew for "matches") celebrates couples that met at camp. Ramahmarriages.org, a page on the Reshet Ramah website, is dedicated to couples who met at summer camp.

Last summer, Reshet Ramah launched "RamahDate," a new partnership with the Jewish online dating giant JDate. RamahDate members subscribe to JDate through a co-branded portal and receive an identifying Ramah "badge" on their online profile. Then, they can choose to either "meet" only other Ramah members or search more broadly within JDate's 750,000 members worldwide.

Aaron Bogage says the online portal makes sense for keeping those camper connections going.

"Campers create relationships and bonds they will have for years," he says. "Jewish camps can help kids marry Jewish when they grow up."

"It's possible to find happiness in so many Jewish situations," adds Lauren Ben-Shoshan. "Camp happens to be a very good one." ■

A little preparation goes a long way

MARILYN LAZAR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Every parent sending a child off to overnight camp for the first time believes that the camper will have a positive experience.

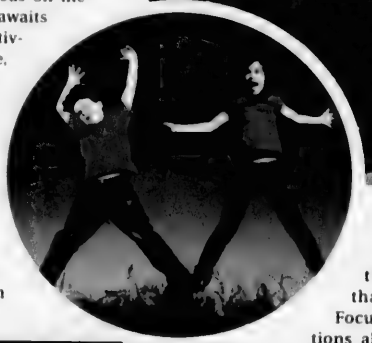
Parents steel themselves, though, for their child getting a little bout of homesickness. How can you best prepare your first-time camper for the new environment, and perhaps just as importantly, how can you tweak your own behaviour and response to mitigate their anxiety as much as possible?

There's a lot you can do to set your kids up for success, and there are some common pitfalls to avoid.

Deciding on the length of time for their first stay is important. One rule of thumb is to leave them wanting more and let them come home on a high. That being said, it can take time to regain composure and sometimes that introductory period barely brings them out of their initial adjustment phase. You know your child, but take into account the culture of the camp by speaking to the director and perhaps a counsellor or parents of older campers before deciding.

Familiarity breeds comfort so visit the camp if possible or at least check out the website together. Arrange a pre-camp get-together with other campers. Have a sleepover at a friend's or grandparents. Be casual in advance and nonplussed if it doesn't go well, but praise the victory.

Sometimes the best of intentions produce undesired results. For example, telling a child how much you will miss them can create a negative expectation and anxiety. Instead, focus on the great opportunity that awaits and some favourite activities that will be available, such as water skiing or whatever their favourite is. Share your own positive experience or that of someone they know, such as an older cousin who they look up to.



Once they're gone, the same rule applies. Don't say you miss them or respond in kind if they write that to you. Focus on questions about activities, accomplishments and forming friendships. Adopt a positive tone and provide news about yourself.

Simple good parenting goes a long way. Foster independence by involving them in simple household chores and age-appropriate decision-making. Transfer those skills and have your child be an active participant in shopping and packing for camp.

Begin teaching them to respect rules by doing so yourself. Why cram their bag with secret stashes of contraband candy? There are reasons for these rules ranging from unwanted animals in the cabin to potential conflict and power struggles with their peers who don't have candy. There are plenty of treats distributed at camp every day.

Don't hide a cell phone. Allow them to exist device-free for a short time. Let them spread their wings.

Obviously, there's a lot you can't prepare for: specific situations, choices, personalities and group dynamics. That's why it's essential to promote self advocacy and respectful communication skills. Try to instil the need for respecting general safety and especially water safety rules and skills.

The things you can do to benefit a child in a camp situation are really skills that will benefit any individual in the long run. Being social yet independent, respectful yet able to advocate for oneself are balanced skills which will give a child a leg up in camp, in school, in a career and in life. ■

Israel enters the 1990s, and actor at centre of espresso battle

Bye-bye, fax machines?

Israel's government bureaucracy is finally entering the late 20th century with a proposal to let citizens submit important documents via email instead of by fax or in person. The new rules, tabled Jan. 17 as part of a new "Digital Israel" initiative, aim to replace the current system of faxes and desperate visits to government offices on lunch breaks. But the government isn't the only sector that hasn't kept pace with Israel's "Start-up Nation" image: Israeli banks and other private enterprises still rely heavily on fax machines and in-person visits.

Dispute brews over Clooney

Nestlé, the maker of Nespresso coffee machines, is suing a small Israeli rival over an ad featuring a look-alike of actor George Clooney, who's starred in the Swiss food giant's own ads since 2006. The humorous spot for Espresso Club boasts that consumers only pay for coffee pods, not machines, and it mocks Clooney's reputation as a lady's man. It features a silver-haired doppelganger of the Gravity and Ocean's Eleven star carrying what looks like a Nespresso bag out of a store as he smiles at a woman passing by, and a disclaimer specifies the actor is not Clooney. A Tel Aviv court rejected Nestlé's claim two years ago, but the company last week appealed the ruling, calling the ad misleading. It wants $50,000 in damages and for the spot to be removed from YouTube.

Militia men blow their own horns

It wasn't quite like Rosh Hashanah at your local shul, but on Jan. 17, Blaine Cooper – a leader of the standoff with the U.S. government in Burns, Ore., and head of a citizen militia in Arizona – posted a video on Facebook showing two right-wing militants blowing large shofars to rally fellow travellers to their cause. For almost a month, dozens of armed men have occupied the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge to protest the jail time given to two men for arson. The militants also want to publicize "tyrannical" management of federal land. "CHRISTIANS THE BATTLE TRUMPET HAS BEEN SOUNDED TIME TO RISE!" Cooper's accompanying Facebook caption read. ■

Remembering a scholar

What a lovely and well deserved tribute to Adam Fuerstenberg by Bill Gladstone ("Ryerson professor loved literacy, Yiddish and family," Jan.14).

It should be emphasized that Adam also loved community. He was a valued colleague in his community work. His love and appreciation of Jewish culture was not merely to preserve a precious past but to translate it into material for an evolving and vibrant future. He will be greatly missed.

Terrorism is never justified

A very well written letter by Kathy Schneider regarding Jewish terror in your Jan. 21 edition caught my eye, regarding the unrelenting attacks Israelis have been facing during the last three to four months.

It was fine until the third paragraph, where she starts off by saying, "However I can understand the sheer frustration and sense of helplessness…"

Please stop right there! Those words lead to a very slippery slope! Those are exactly the words Palestinians, western diplomats, political pundits and others use when describing Palestinian terror attacks on innocent Israelis, in defence of their not having a Palestinian state, the lack of a peace process, or Jews visiting the Temple Mount etc.

It is the same words that terrorist groups such as Hamas, Hezbollah, Al Qaeda, ISIS, Boko Haram and others use in their jihads to describe how western culture interferes with their barbaric way of life, and so, out of frustration, they kill countless innocent men, women and children, like the six innocent Quebecers killed earlier this month in Burkina Faso, who were helping people there improve their lives.

There is no justification – ever – for taking an innocent life, be it Jewish, Muslim, or anyone else. That is not the Jewish way. It is not the solution, as Schneider says, and rightly so. If only our leaders had some answers.

Missing a chief rabbi

Let's not be naive. All rabbis – sorry, all people – need to dabble in politics, not just a chief rabbi ("Canada has no chief rabbi, thank God," Jan. 14).

To get to the issue the article avoids, the position of chief rabbi (de facto) unites the Israeli community, while a population without a chief rabbi, perhaps one that seems to choose pluralism as a higher value, does not have a central figure to unite around. In my opinion, the Jewish people of Canada and the United States suffer because there is no central rabbinate to unite them.

Trudeau is no Bill Clinton

It is jarring to see Justin Trudeau mentioned in the same breath as two of America's most gifted and accomplished politicians, Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Bill Clinton ("Trudeau should learn from Clinton, Moynihan and Cotler," Jan. 21).

Regardless of whether one agreed with their views or was accepting of the private shenanigans of Clinton, it is widely accepted that both of those gentlemen were consummate practitioners of the art of Realpolitik in the field of international diplomacy.

The Canadian electorate – having fallen for the cleverly marketed Trudeau glamour factor and having ignored the facts of his abysmal lack of the personal qualities, skills and experience required in the leader of any nation – can now look forward to four years of continual bumbling by Trudeau on the international stage.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Prayer that captures the imagination

With Aleinu, we declare a particularistic assertion to our own people, but we also declare a universalistic hope that one day the world will be united and more human

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: One of the most fundamental aspects of Judaism is tfillah – prayer. Yet notwithstanding its centrality, especially in the synagogue, many find it a locked door. Sometimes it helps to slow down and to focus on just one prayer. How about Aleinu?

It is perhaps one of the most well-known prayers for how it ends – everyone seemingly knows the words off by heart. Those who talk their way through services would not dare to miss belting out its last few lines.

What is it about this prayer that captures the imagination? I think that the aspects most central to Judaism are those prayers that the Jewish People, over the years, have come to sing along to with gusto.

We begin Aleinu with the words: "It is upon us to praise the Master of all." How do you understand this prayer? What does it mean to you?

Rabbi Splansky: Aleinu is the bookend to the Shema.

With Aleinu, we declare a particularistic assertion to our own people: "Hear O Israel, HaShem is One." With Aleinu, we declare a universalistic hope that one day all the world will be united as one. It challenges us to make it so through our deeds.

Perhaps that's why the Aleinu is placed at the end of the prayer service. With its rousing chorus it points to what we must do when we leave the doors of the sanctuary.

Rabbi Fishman: "Imagine all the people… living in harmony." I can hear John Lennon now. Yet I believe the singular most dangerous threat religion poses is people who claim we have to make each person like us.

This is the root cause of fundamentalist religion today: I'm right, you're wrong. I hold the truth, you are a child of falsehood. I'm saved, and you're damned. The only salvation is to be like me.

How the Aleinu prayer can come to that final conclusion of praying for a future where we are united as one is something I haven't yet figured out. Yet while we still live on this side of history, I think there is a dignity to our differences. While there is universality in heaven, God somehow appreciates having a plurality down here on earth.

Rabbi Splansky: This prayer has been controversial for both Jews and gentiles. In the last five centuries, there have been many variations of the text.

In an age that values diversity of thought and belief, how can we understand this call for all peoples to unite under God's rule? Elie Wiesel explains: "The mission of the Jewish People has never been to make the world more Jewish, but to make the world more human."

Rabbi Fishman: At the heart of the Aleinu prayer is the value that the Jewish People are distinct, that we are a people "chosen by God."

This is an oft-misunderstood concept. In today's society of pluralism, acceptance and the equality of each human being, the concept of being part of the "Chosen People" is seemingly anathema.

Yet it need not be. In fact, the classic approach to this idea is best articulated by Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, who argued that "value is granted not to lineage and ties of birth but to the inwardness of a person – to his humanity."

Chosenness is, therefore, a call to responsibility, a challenge to live up to greatness and thereby bring others along with us.

Rabbi Splansky: Henrietta Szold wrote: "Our abilities will be on trial before a world full of nations which will judge us in the light of a glorious past of ideal service to humankind. For [the People of] Israel, election has never meant anything but obligation… It is a task, a heavy task, a holy task."

Aleinu was originally composed for Rosh Hashanah, when we celebrate the conception of the universe. By the early 14th century, it became the concluding hope of every prayer service throughout the year.

I can understand how it became so popular. It zooms out, focuses our eyes on the big picture, gets us to see above and beyond our own suffering. ■

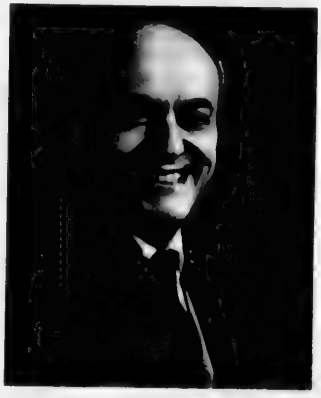
Peter Ziegler

"So many people, so many places, such upheavals, never-forgotten abysmal horrors and sadness, then peace, followed by joy, always change and never-ending complexity. But, above all else, work, hope, love and so much beauty everywhere. It has been a fascinating life."

– PETER ZIEGLER



Peter Ziegler defied the odds. After losing his parents and sister in the Holocaust, he built a wonderful life in Toronto with a 32-year career as a biochemist. Despite the trauma and hardships, he understood the importance of forgiveness and giving back. He also believed in the power of research. Today, we celebrate his extraordinary legacy gift to the Lunenfeld-Tanenbaum Research Institute, part of Sinai Health System, that will support research discoveries now and for the future.

While in Paris for the UN Climate Change Summit in December, Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre, centre, held a follow-up meeting with leaders of the French Jewish community, including Yonatan Arfi, left, vice-president of CRIF, and Serge Dahan, president of B'nai Brith France. Coderre first met Arfi and Dahan in the wake of last January's Paris attacks on a visit to the Hyper Cacher market and hosted them in Montreal at a summit of French and Montreal community leaders he convened last June on the role of cities in combating anti-Semitism.

A long, strange trip through Jewish music

Every month, I look forward to receiving a new package from PJ Library, the visionary project that delivers Jewish-themed books to kids across North America and beyond, free of charge.

Since there are nearly 150,000 subscribers to PJ Library, clearly I'm not alone. Over the last few years, our family has enjoyed titles like Todah, Mitzi's Mitzvah, 3 Falafels in my Pita, Sammy Spider's First Book of Jewish Holidays and my personal favourite, Shai's Shabbat Walk.

Last month's PJ Library dispatch, though, was something different – a CD called Shabbat Love Music. The album's 14 tunes are simple and upbeat, but there are enough clever tidbits to keep music snobs like me listening, too. Sam Glaser's Shabbas mixes in classic doo-wop with the blessing over the Shabbat candles; the twangy guitar backing Ellen Allard's We Sing Shabbat, We Sing Shalom reminds me that I should plug my Telecaster into that vintage Fender amp every now and again (even if the neighbours complain); Elena Jagoda's rendition of Zum Gali Gali recalls the opening of The Beatles' Tomorrow Never Knows; and The Macaroons' two contributions, Shabbat Lullaby and Shabbos Morning, are both eminently listenable. (And my kids like them, too.)

Shabbat Music Love is now permanently on rotation in our car's CD player, and on more than a few occasions recently, I've found myself listening to it on the way to and from work, humming the tunes to myself in the office, or trying to master the D-major riff that anchors Shabbat Lullaby late at night (hint: it is not dissimilar to Pink Floyd's Run Like Hell).

More than anything, though, Shabbat Music Love takes me back to the Jewish music I listened to as a child – the classics of the genre, like Uncle Moishy and the Mitzvah Men and The Marvelous Middos Machine (featuring the interstellar exploits of Shnooki, Dr. Middos, Dizzy and the dastardly Dr. Doomstein). It reminds me of The Miami Boys Choir cassettes that were on heavy rotation in my father's car (along with Creedence Clearwater Revival), and the time my sister and I attended the local debut of teen sensation Yehuda!, who wowed the crowd with his virtuoso keytar playing.

Later, my Jewish music tastes gravitated toward jam-inclined groups like Reva L'Sheva and The Moshav Band. While studying at seminary in Israel in my late teens, I'd take every opportunity I could to see both bands perform live – whether at a Jewish music festival on Mevo Modi'im, the moshav founded by Shlomo Carlebach himself, or in Jerusalem clubs like The Yellow Submarine (where Reva and Moshav were just as likely to noodle through Grateful Dead deep cuts as they were classic niggunim).

Eventually, inspired by the work of the Diaspora Yeshiva Band, I got into the action myself, as part of the hard-rock outfit Shirayim. Playing Jewish music at ear-splitting levels on the stage of Toronto's Horseshoe Tavern, as Jewish kids and drunk bikers danced together below, remains one of my proudest life achievements.

You might say my journey through Jewish music has been a long, strange trip. And as I listen to Shabbat Love Music, I wonder where it will lead to next. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

'Little Dunkirk': A very different Holocaust story

Adam Fuerstenberg

Editor's Note: Adam Fuerstenberg, who passed away Jan. 3, was the founder of the Canadian Jewish Book Awards and a Canadian Jewish News contributor. He published the following story in the Oct. 30, 2003 edition of The CJN.

It was an unusually chilly morning on Oct. 7, 1943, and Dr. Karl Henry Koster, medical head of the Bispebjerg Hospital, one of the Copenhagen's largest, was just about to enter his third-floor office in the main wing after completing his first round of inspections when he noticed one of his medical students, Jorgen Knudsen, rushing towards him.

"Please excuse me, Dr. Koster, but I am desperate. Time is short and I don't know whom else I can turn to. Once, during one of your demonstrations, you hinted strongly about your opposition to the Nazis, and there is a rumour among the students that you are active in the underground."

He paused, and when the doctor nodded encouragingly, he continued: "Yesterday, morning, just as I was leaving for work in my ambulance, some of my student friends rushed over to me to tell me that the Gestapo were rounding up the Jews, and urged me to warn all my Jewish friends. But I didn't know which of my friends or acquaintances were Jewish.

"I ran to the nearest phone book and took down names that seemed obviously Jewish. When I drove to the addresses, I had to warn them. Many had no place where they could go, so I took them in my ambulance. But now I don't know where to hide them so I decided to ask you to help."

He had 40 men, women and children, he said, and he wondered if they could be hidden at the hospital until they could be smuggled out of Copenhagen. The doctor instantly agreed and told Knudsen to bring the 40 the next morning.

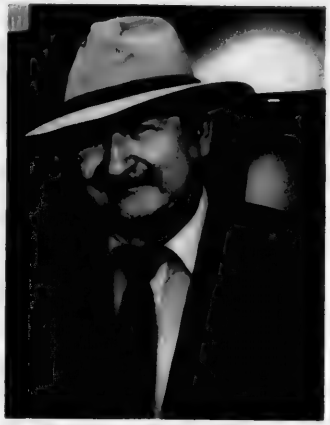
To get the group past the Gestapo, they agreed to stage a mock funeral. At eight the next morning, a frantic gatekeeper reported to Koster that a hearse and a large funeral party carrying flowers were demanding entry at the hospital's main gate. When Koster went down to welcome the party, he found Knudsen with some more of his students, but instead of the 40 souls he had expected there were 140.

In the next few days, Bispebjerg Hospital would hide almost another 1,000 refugees, who were then smuggled to the small fishing villages on the coast a few sea miles from Sweden across the Sund, the strait that separates Denmark from southern Sweden.

At the hospital, they were hidden as patients under fictitious names and in 130 apartments that the nurses vacated for them. Almost the whole staff helped. Many risked their lives volunteering to transport the Jews to the fishing villages. Some of the doctors and nurses were caught and arrested, and on being freed, went right back to the rescue effort. A few were killed by the Gestapo.

The Bispebjerg Hospital rescue is only one of a host of hair-raising experiences recorded during this truly different Holocaust story – Denmark's inspiring rescue of almost all of its Jewish population of 8,000. The story of this heroic rescue has come to be known as "Little Dunkirk" because of the motley assortment of small craft used to ferry the Jews to safety in Sweden.

What made the courageous effort of the staff at Bispebjerg Hospital even more remarkable was the fact that it was not the exception, but the norm. From King



Adam Fuerstenberg

Christian X – whose brusque answer to the Nazi demand that Denmark do something about its "Jewish Problem" was that Denmark had no Jewish problem because its Jews were equal Danes: "Viking Jews" he called them – to the humble street cleaner, all took part.

Tens of thousands of Danes, businessmen, professors, clergy, taxi drivers, fishwives, farmers, train conductors, even policemen, took up the challenge to sabotage the Nazi effort to destroy the Jewish community of Denmark. The authorities refused to co-operate, and the bishops circulated a pastoral letter to be read to all congregations denouncing the Nazi attempt as un-Christian, and urging their parishioners to help their Jewish fellow citizens.

For three weeks, beginning on the night of Rosh Hashanah, Oct. 1, 1943, the Danes smuggled them out in fishing boats, pleasure craft, even rowboats across the strait to a welcoming Sweden. Some 7,200 Danish Jews and Jewish refugees who had escaped the Nazi terror since 1933, as well as 700 non-Jewish relatives of these Jews, escaped the fate of their co-religionists in all the Nazi-occupied countries of Europe.

The Germans did manage to arrest about 500, whom they transported to the "model" concentration camp at Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia. But so powerful was the Danes' concern for their Jewish citizens that the Danish government bureaucracy and the public sent food parcels to Theresienstadt and successfully demanded that the Germans allow a Danish delegation to come and check on the Danish detainees.

Most Holocaust historians now agree that the German commanders in Denmark, S.S. Gen. Werner Best, and the military commander, Gen. von Hannecken, were aware of the rescue, but were forced to ignore it out of the fear of Danish resoluteness. They feared that Denmark, strategically located and supplying Germany with 10 per cent of its food, would rise in total revolt and hamper the already stalling German war effort.

Almost as astounding as the spontaneous Danish rescue of the Jews, was the joyous welcome they received on returning. Most remarkable of all was the fact that their Danish neighbours had carefully safeguarded Jewish businesses, houses and even personal property.

Dr. Nathan Bamberger, whose father was the rabbi of the famous old Leaderstraede Synagogue during the rescue, recalls with wonder that "when we returned to our home, which we had had to leave so suddenly on the eve of Rosh Hashanah 1943, all the settings at our dining table were still exactly as we had left them." ■

Searching for the Amazonian Jews of Peru

Finding the country's second-largest Jewish community is no easy task, as MICHAEL FRAIMAN discovered

The biggest problem facing the only synagogue in the Amazonian city of Iquitos, Peru, is that nobody knows where it is. Hotel concierges won't know what you're talking about; tell a moto-taxi driver to take you there and he'll shake his head briskly and drive away. Ask a middle-aged police officer wearing faded pink lipstick who's standing idly at the corner of the Plaza de Armas, the city's main square, and she'll asked her two friends, a bank security guard and the man with a machete selling coconuts for a buck apiece before laughing at how nobody knows what you're talking about.

Iquitos is a difficult city by any measure – it's hard to reach, hard to digest and hard to live in, buried so deep northeast into the Peruvian Amazon that you can't even drive there, since no roads connect it to the outside world. To arrive, you must fly in from Lima or hitch a ride on a cargo boat, sleeping in hammocks and snaking through jungle rivers for up to four days straight.

Immediately upon stepping off the plane with my girlfriend and de facto Spanish translator, we met with a humidity we never knew existed – an inescapable 90 per cent year-round one, that keeps palm trees moist and the sky an unpredictable shade of grey. There's no escaping it; you sweat just standing still. As we toured the city that afternoon, we found restaurants overpriced (after all, you've got to add the cost of shipping ingredients more than 1,000 kilometres from Lima into your bill), mosquitos buzzing everywhere, fearless dragonflies landing on our clothes and rampant poverty stifling riverside villages propped up by decrepit wooden stilts for when the water levels rise.

It struck us as odd, then, that this should be home to the second largest Jewish community in Peru.

I first read about these so-called "Amazonian Jews" in the context of their Israeli dreams: hundreds of Iquiteño Jews have made aliyah and moved to the Holy Land in the last two decades, mostly to the central city of Ramla. But that publicity is almost all that's known about them.

What fascinated me more than those who left were those who stayed, that handful of practising Jews whose very existence faces constant pressure by, on one side, Lima's Ashkenazi elite (who don't consider the Iquiteños Jews at all, since they're almost entirely descendants of Jewish men), and on the other by the allure of abandoning impoverished Peru for First World Israel. Who built the synagogue? How do they keep kosher? And why, frankly, do they bother with Judaism at all?

We decided to start with the synagogue. I'd looked up the address online – Próspero 241, near the central Plaza de Armas in the city's dirty colonial downtown, where every building features old Maltese balconies, arched doors and wooden shutters – but we missed it walking up and down main street. Instead, having gone too far south, we found a subtle artifact of the city's Jewish past: above the main doorway of a large one-story supermarket at the corner of Próspero and Morona, beautifully tiled with ornate iron grills over the windows, we noticed the twisty art nouveau words, "Cohen & Co." The building, we'd later learn, was built by a wealthy Jewish man in 1905 and sold once his family moved in the mid-1910s.

The air was too muggy to keep pacing the streets endlessly, so we decided to hitch a moto-taxi to the city's quasi-famed Jewish cemetery. An online map pointed to a plot of land at the intersection of Putumayo and Alzamora, a dozen or so blocks north of where we were, but we arrived only to find in its place the Max Augustín Stadium, a newly built out-of-place 25,000-seat soccer arena. Aggravated, we asked a nearby shopkeeper where the nearest cemetery was, and she told us to try the central one, a five-minute ride south, near the lively and pungent Belen Market.

Mideast peace can only be based on mutual understanding

Mira Sucharov

If you want to understand Palestinian political consciousness, look no further than a cartoon character named Handala. Made of white card stock inked with black marker and held high above the crowd, Handala made his most recent appearance Jan. 15 at a West Bank rally calling for non-violence and an end to the occupation, hosted by two Israeli-Palestinian groups: Combatants for Peace and Standing Together.

Handala was created by the late Palestinian cartoonist Naji Al-Ali, who drew in the 1970s and 1980s. He's depicted as a barefoot, 10-year-old Palestinian child whom Al-Ali describes as "not a fat, happy, relaxed or pampered child." Handala is bald, save for several spikes of hair, and he clasps his hands "behind his back as a sign of rejection at a time when solutions are presented to us the American way."

When Handala returns to Palestine, Al-Ali adds, he "will still be 10, and then he will start growing up… Things will become normal again when the homeland returns." (Al-Ali's words come from the website handala.org.)

Like other North American kids of my generation, I, too, grew up with a bald cartoon character created around the same time as Handala. Tom Wilson's Ziggy faced daily challenges and existential dilemmas, but serious political commentary was absent. In my Ziggy-illustrated binder in sixth grade at Winnipeg's Talmud Torah school, I learned about Zionist history, sang Hatikvah, and memorized the list of Israeli presidents and prime ministers for the annual JNF Israel contest. No notes were taken of the Palestinian experience.

Looking at Handala points to some uncomfortable truths. First, Palestinian resistance – and yes, even rejection of proposals they deem unjust – is a reality.

We could point to the Palestinian rejection of the 1947 UN partition resolution and conclude Palestinians made their bed that day and, therefore, must lie in it. Sure, how sweet it would have been had the Palestinian national movement agreed to the division. But it's not surprising that a national group whose collective identity was tied up in the land opposed it. And now, in 2016, with Israel occupying the West Bank as a dangling appendage to its post-1949 armistice borders, we must acknowledge that a Palestinian state based on 1967 lines – if the parties ever agree on it – is still only 22 per cent of the land Palestinians view as theirs.

But the toughest part of Handala for Israelis and their supporters to stomach is the fact he's not merely a West Bank resident opposing military occupation and desiring Palestinian national sovereignty. Handala represents the crux of historical Palestinian memory. He's a refugee child, frozen in time, who hopes to return. When Zionists hear "refugee return," they fear refugee flooding and the end of the Jewish state – what Israelis call the "demographic threat."

It's well known in policy circles that there are clear and obvious solutions to the refugee question that address some – though not all – Palestinian claims. These might involved some family reunification and mostly repatriation to a new Palestinian state in the West Bank (and possibly Gaza). They may involve financial compensation. And, though it's hard to imagine such words being uttered by Israel's current government, there may even be some sort of apology, or at least recognition of some responsibility.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas has already publicly renounced his claim to territory in pre-1967 Israel. But collective memory is strong, and the injustice of the Nakba – whether primarily a function of Israeli expulsions or Arab states' decision to launch war following Israel's 1948 declaring of independence – still stings.

In order to inch toward agreement with the Palestinians, the hard work of government-to-government negotiation must be supplemented by the people-to-people work of setting the stage for ratifying any deal. Part of this means taking the historical narratives of the other seriously and realizing the gaping wounds of memory are difficult to suture without really listening and understanding. ■

Others will pay for America's lack of resolve on Iran

Mordechai Ben-Dat

There's a powerful scene in the film Love and Death, Woody Allen's hilarious parody of the large, brooding 19th-century Russian novel. Allen's character, a luckless Russian infantryman, casts his eyes high above to the hilltops where his army's generals sit loftily and safely on their horses, observing the battle raging below. Standing in the muck and chaos of the bloody fighting, he says, "Wow! The battle looks completely different when you're in the middle of it than it does to the generals up on the hill."

That observation came to mind on Jan. 16, when leaders of the West congratulated themselves as the nuclear deal with Iran took effect. With it, of course, came the imminent flow into the Iranian treasury of some $100 billion (US).

"Today… the United States, our friends and allies in the Middle East, and the entire world are safer because the threat of the nuclear weapon has been reduced," U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry enthused in Vienna. Other spokespeople for the western governments involved in the agreement made similar pronouncements.

Meanwhile, leaders in the Middle East, the region where Tehran's treachery and duplicity cause unceasing death and destruction, had a different view.

"The 'implementation day' of the nuclear agreement ushers us into a new and dangerous era, in which Iran is freed from most of its economic sanctions, without having to quit its nuclear program or provide explanations for its military activities," said Israel's strategic affairs minister Gilad Erdan.

Does any serious thinker or even casual observer of the Middle East doubt how Iran will spend the majority of the billions? Its supreme leader, Ali Khamenei and his personally directed attack force, the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, have already made public their chief spending priority: upgrading the military. And Russia has already sold Iran the advanced S-300 anti-aircraft defence system. In addition, the two countries are negotiating possible sales to Iran of advanced fighter jets, anti-ship cruise missiles and T-90 tanks. France, too, has won a portion of the Iranian sanctions-liberated lottery and is currently negotiating a massive sale of Dassault Rafale fighter jets.

And does any serious thinker or even casual observer doubt that some of this new weaponry – not to mention some of the billions of newly received U.S. dollars – will be conveyed to Iran's surrogates and violent satraps in the region?

Former CIA director David Petraeus has no illusions about Iranian intentions. In a recent interview with Ha'aretz, he noted: "We must recognize that it has been Iranian expansionism that has helped fan the flames of Sunni extremism, whether by enabling [President] Bashar Assad's campaign of slaughter in Syria or backing sectarian elements in Iraq or Yemen. That is why at the same time that we step up our campaign to combat the Islamic State, we also need a reinvigorated effort to counter and roll back Iran's malign activities across the region."

The American administration, however, has adamantly refused to "roll back Iran's malign activities across the region." One need not look further than Iran's recent illegal testing of long-range ballistic missiles and its illegal detention of U.S. sailors whose boats mistakenly crossed into Iranian waters.

In both cases, the administration's response was obsequious. In the former case, only after "implementation day" of the nuclear deal and after President Barack Obama had threatened to block renewed Congressional sanctions against Iran for violating the UN resolution prohibiting the test of the missiles did the U.S. Treasury Department impose sanctions against 11 listed individuals and companies. In the latter case, Kerry gave effusive thanks to his Iranian counterpart for not harming the Americans whose very detention had violated all international norms.

In both cases, Tehran tested Washington's resolve. In both cases, Washington showed none. It will fall to the countries in the Middle East who are the targets of Iran's malign activities to show the resolve the West so alarmingly lacks. ■

If we all give, it will be like winning the lottery

Rabbi Jay Kelman, CPP, CA

There's not much you can do with a toonie. But there's a lot you can do with many of them. When many people join together and each give $2, they might be lucky enough to share a jackpot of $1.6 billion, as three people did in the recent Powerball lottery. Despite odds of more than 292 billion to 1, millions of people bought tickets in pursuit of riches.

These staggering odds aren't even recognized as having any bearing in Jewish law, which pays no attention to such far-fetched odds. This was the core of the debate over the 18th-century German law that insisted we wait three days before burying the dead, lest one mistakenly be buried alive. The vast majority of rabbinic scholars opposed the law, despite the potential people might be declared dead too early. While the fundamental principle that saving a life pushes aside all commandments of the Torah (with three exceptions), the odds of such early burial were so slim that Jewish law ignored them.

Yet such odds don't seem to faze the masses. Millions were willing to pay $2 for the chance to dream, if ever so fleetingly, of joining the world's club of billionaires. It may be totally irrational, but, heck, what's $2? And if it stopped at that, there would be little to be concerned with. And when we recall how money that's not distributed to lottery winners is spent enhancing public services, there's much to be gained from lotteries.

However, research has shown lotteries are, in many respects, a tax on the poor, who, due to their often-desperate attempts to escape poverty, effectively throw money in the garbage. (And we can discuss the research that demonstrates lottery winners are within a short period of time no happier than others and that many actually wish they'd never won.) I don't know if this is enough reason to ban lotteries, but it's something we must be concerned with.

Rabbinic authorities debate whether a lottery is prohibited as a form of gambling, with the majority differentiating between the two. This is especially true of charity lotteries, where the majority of funds go to the charity, and people tend to buy tickets not because of potential winnings, but as a chance to support a charity.

Of course, in practice, the odds of winning are much greater than any of the government-run lotteries, and it's perhaps sad that many ticket buyers need the enticement of potential winnings in order to offer their support. Yet such is human nature, and provided there's no serious harm done, we ought to take advantage of it for the community's benefit.

It's this understanding of human nature that helps raise large sums for new buildings. While it would be preferable that such largesse be given anonymously, human nature being what it is, Jewish law not only allows, but strongly encourages that donors' names be given great prominence, as this will lead to larger amounts raised for charity.

While we may debate the merits of lotteries, there's no debate that small amounts of money given by everyone can make a huge difference. It's through the contributions of just a half shekel per person that the Tabernacle was built and maintained.

In that vein, I'd like to suggest that every member of the Jewish community donate half of the saving of the middle class tax cut that took effect Jan. 1. The federal tax rate was lowered by 1.5 per cent on all income between $45,282 and $90,563. That saving, combined with the provincial tax savings, can total more than $1,000 a year.

If all who benefit would contribute half of their newly found savings to support Jewish education, we as a community could raise millions of dollars a year. It's money that's desperately needed and yet within reach, if we all do our part. ■

Airlines must do better for the disabled

Norma Baumel Joseph

Commercial airlines claim to be wheelchair accessible. Their compliance with certain standards of accommodation for the disabled is the law. Our experience puts the lie to that claim.

As many CJN readers know, my husband, Rabbi Howard Joseph, is confined to a wheelchair because he cannot walk. We have travelled before and managed, although one Canadian carrier lost our wheelchair.

Despite that experience, we planned a trip for our grandson's bar mitzvah. Of course, the storm arrived in time for our departure. The flight was cancelled, but don't worry, came the email, we have rebooked you: Howard on one flight and Norma on another! Thus began our great adventure in catastrophe. Our agent had noted on the ticket that we three were not to be separated (my husband's aide travels with us). But computerized software does not read added notations.

(Caveat: we would never have survived and arrived at our simchah without the watchful guardianship of our wonderful agent.)

The airlines did their best to destroy our plans and us.

I bought three new first-class tickets. Our only priority was to get to the bar mitzvah. Typically, I buy Howard first-class tickets, as he cannot walk down the aisle to economy. But this time, for all of us, first-class were the only seats available.

When we arrived in Toronto, we missed our connection. No one seemed to care that leaving a disabled man overnight was not a simple matter. We managed to transfer to a partner carrier so that we could get to Denver the same day. Incomprehensibly, the new airline recognized their partnership enough to accept our tickets for travel to Denver. But they placed us all in economy when I had clearly bought and paid for first-class seats. I started worrying immediately about getting my husband all the way into the economy seats, but I was thrilled we had seats on a plane.

The flight was delayed from 4 to 8 p.m. At that point, we had been up since 2 a.m. and eager to get to our destination. I consistently urged the various agents to place my husband in the empty business class seat. No one was interested, but they all assured me that agents on the ground would have the necessary equipment to get him on board. Don't worry!

> How can we exact justice, decency, respect or fairness from our transportation industry?

At the gate, the local agent explained that the plane's access was via stairs only. She asked: "Can't he just walk up the stairs?" How embarrassing for him. The passengers got on, and a ramp was put over the stairs.

Another agent pushed him up the ramp. Lo and behold, the ramp stopped four feet shy of the door to the aircraft. The agent looked at me and asked, "What shall I do?"

"Yes, What will you do?" I replied.

She responded: "He will just have to stay here and not travel."

Is this wheelchair accessibility? Does this fit with any assurance that agents have the necessary equipment? Does this sound like staff that is helpful and supportive?

Our aide then lifted my husband and carried him over the narrow bridge into the aircraft. There was an empty seat in the first row. I asked the staff on board to please let Howard sit down. It was no longer safe for him to be carried forward, but the onboard crew steadfastly refused.

Exhausted and distressed, we finally reached our destination, but you guessed it: our luggage did not.

What kind of service, care and responsibility is this? Is this what we can expect in terms of wheelchair accessibility? Is this the face of human decency? We met a legally blind woman on that plane who was equally traumatized by the staff and the conditions. How can we exact justice, decency, respect or fairness from our transportation industry? Is this the 21st century? Is this the Canadian or American way? ■

Opinions differ on Canada's air role against ISIS

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Trudeau government is being tested on crucial foreign policy matters early in its mandate, and reactions have been mixed about how it's dealing with the fight against terrorism.

Last week, the government came under fire from opposition critics who said the decision to end the air bombing mission against the Islamic State (ISIS) led to Canada being snubbed at a Jan. 20 meeting of allies in Paris to discuss further measures to be taken against the terrorist organization.

Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan brushed off suggestions Canada has been sidelined in the fight against terror.

"Meetings happen all the time," he said.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) did not take sides on the bombing debate, but the organization's CEO, Shimon Fogel, said "Canadians are united in their desire to make a meaningful contribution to the international coalition working to degrade ISIS.

"It is difficult to imagine an enemy in our time more vicious and deserving of military action than ISIS, but this fact does not preclude a reasonable debate around the most effective contribution Canada has to offer. It would be perfectly credible for Canada to alter its current role in a manner that provides similar or greater value to the coalition effort. The test of this will be the degree to which Canada's revised contribution achieves practical results in the campaign to counter ISIS and is welcomed by the international community as constructive, valuable and effective."

Referring to the cessation of the CF-18 air campaign, Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said, "We believe that Canada has a moral and possibly legal obligation through NATO to stand shoulder to shoulder with its allies against terrorism. Canada has always stood the test of time in defence of freedom, democracy and human rights, and it shall do so once again."

Karen Mock, a spokesperson for JSpace Canada, a left-wing pro-Israel organization, said "Canada is clearly part of a multi-faceted approach to countering ISIS. It is my understanding that the ministers and staff have visited the region on numerous occasions, consulted about the most effective role for Canada now and have made an appropriate decision given our resources and the current need to fill gaps in the overall strategy."

"Training is a role we have played in the past and that we do well. And there is a great need for humanitarian aid in the region," she said.

As to suggestions Canada was snubbed by not being invited to the Paris meeting, Mock said countries attending on Jan. 20 were "countries that have attended meetings together before, as an ongoing part of the coalition. Canada has not been at those meetings in the past. So I don't think we should consider it a snub that they are not there now, but just that an additional meeting was called that included the countries they had been included at these meetings in the past."

Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan

One of the more emotional responses to the government's air policy decision was voiced by Camille Carrier, whose daughter, Maude, was one of six Canadian humanitarian workers – all from Quebec – killed in Burkina Faso earlier this month by Islamic terrorists affiliated with Al Qaeda.

"I was ashamed before this happened, but obviously the loss of my daughter has only made me more revolted about this situation," said Carrier, a retired administration professor at the Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières.

She said Trudeau "offers shallow words about inclusion and tolerance. We need to do more. We need our leader to pay attention to legitimate security concerns in addition to our image as a welcoming country."

Quebec Premier Philippe Couillard offered condolences following the terrorist attack and said, "These acts must reinforce our determination to combat these barbarians with all of our force next to our allies, without compromise."

Meanwhile, the Conservative party's defense critic James Bezan assailed the decision to withdraw from air combat missions, saying it led to the absence of an invitation to Canada to attend an important policy discussion of defence ministers in Paris.

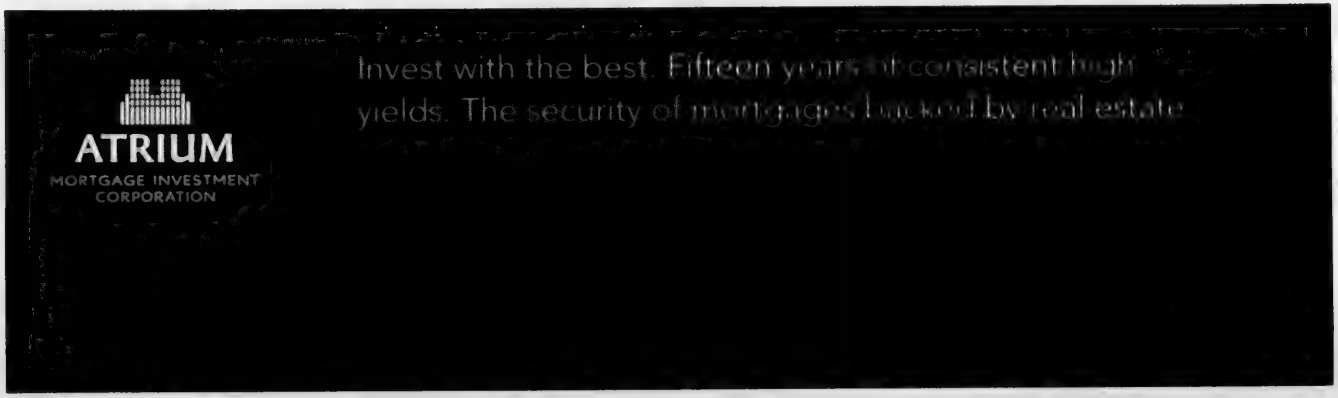
The meeting brought together allies in the anti-ISIS coalition, including the United States, Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Australia and the Netherlands.

"Canada is deliberately being excluded because of this Liberal government's decision to withdraw our CF-18s from the mission against ISIS," Bezan said.

"Once again, this development demonstrates that the Liberal party's policy on fighting ISIS is incoherent, and the decision to withdraw Canada's CF-18s is seen by our allies as stepping back, rather than standing shoulder-to-shoulder with them," Bezan added.

Although Canada didn't participate in the Paris meeting, Sajjan said he is involved in ongoing anti-terror talks and will be discussing ISIS with Canada's allies at two other upcoming meetings, one of them with other defence ministers on Feb. 11.

"We are actively participating on a meaningful basis," Sajjan said. "We're not just looking at the current situation in Syria and Iraq, we're actually looking at the overall threats around the world as well." ■



Briefing memo sparks speculation on Mideast policy

plungen@thecjn.ca

During last fall's election campaign, there was plenty of debate about whether a Liberal victory would mark a change in the country's relationship with Israel. Would it shift to being more even-handed between Israelis and Palestinians and adopt a role as "honest broker," or would it remain as staunchly pro-Israel as it had been under the Harper Conservatives?

A Canadian Press report on a briefing memo prepared by the Privy Council Office for Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has been interpreted by some as signalling a shift. CP, which obtained the memo in an access to information request, said there had been "persistent reports of indirect talks between Israel and Hamas aimed at negotiating an extended ceasefire."

An analyst quoted in the report said the memo indicated the Trudeau government was coming to terms with a "geopolitically significant" development in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and that "it's a pretty sharp contrast with the position of the Harper government."

But not everyone sees it that way.

Israel's embassy in Ottawa looked into the issue, spokesperson Eitan Weiss told The CJN. "We received reassurances from the Canadian foreign ministry that Canadian policy has not changed on this issue."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said his organization hasn't seen the memo, but called the issue "largely a non-story."

"Any observer will tell you that an overwhelming majority of Israelis would welcome long-term quiet with Hamas as per Israel's offer in 2014 of reconstruction in exchange for demilitarization of Gaza. That quiet, however, depends on Hamas ending its theft and misuse of aid intended for Palestinians and its ongoing terror campaign against Israelis. Indeed, were Hamas to accept the Quartet's [the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia] basic conditions – that it unequivocally renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist, and abide by signed Israeli-Palestinian agreements – we would be among the first to welcome this development."

Fogel rejected suggestions there's been a shift in government policy. "Although Trudeau's and Harper's tones and styles are dramatically different, Mr. Trudeau has been unequivocal... that support for Israel will remain a fixture of Canadian foreign policy... firmly rooted in a cross-party consensus and reflecting shared values, interests and opportunities. Mr. Trudeau has also been unequivocal in condemning Hamas as a terrorist organization and upholding Israel's right to defend its people from attacks."

"When CIJA met with Minister of Foreign Affairs Stéphane Dion, he emphasized that Canada's substantive policy vis-à-vis the Middle East would not change, noting that the government would like to play, in their view, a more active role in contributing to regional peace and stability," Fogel added.

Meanwhile, JSpace Canada, a left-wing Zionist group, ran a piece on its website by founding member Harry Schachter that said, "We may be seeing early signs of a shift back to a middle-of-the-road position on Israel-Palestine issues by the new Trudeau government, more in keeping with Canada's historic role in the Middle East."

Noting the previous Tory government would have refused to deal with Hamas, Schachter writes that "whether Israel should negotiate with Hamas has long been a serious question. The CP report could mean that talks between Israel and Hamas would be looked on favourably by the new government in Ottawa."

He suggested ISIS' attempts to make inroads in Gaza would put Hamas in a more positive light for western nations. Even though some in Israel would see an ISIS takeover of the area as giving Israel a freer hand there, "a more secure outcome for Israel – and for the people of Gaza – would surely be talks with Hamas. If the new government of Canada can play in role in facilitating such a process, as part of a realignment of its position in the Middle East, so much the better," he writes. ■

EMPLOYER
Federation CJA

POSITION
Director, GenMTL

FEDERATION CJA

DESCRIPTION OF THE ORGANIZATION

Federation CJA is the central address for the Jewish community of Montreal. We lead in promoting a vibrant and caring Montreal Jewish community, one in which diversity is welcomed and Jewish life, education and values are nurtured and strengthened. Federation CJA embodies Jewish collective responsibility and advances communal interests locally, nationally, in Israel and beyond.

Federation CJA is launching a vision for a new approach to youth and young adult programs and services, integrating Montreal Hillel, March of the Living, Birthright and Federation CJA's Young Adult Division (YAD).

We are now searching for an experienced leader to fill the role of Director, GenMTL for this new department.

SUMMARY OF THE POSITION

The Director of GenMTL is responsible for developing and implementing strategies that will create a vibrant and thriving community for young adults in Montreal including building the professional and volunteer capacity and creating a culture of collaboration.

RESPONSIBILITIES

- Work in concert with the CEO, senior management team and GenMTL staff to set the vision, agenda and strategy for the year;
- Build and supervise a dynamic team of GenMTL professionals;
- Develop and implement outreach activities to engage young Jewish adults;
- Establish, with the CEO and Campaign Director, the goals of the GenMTL annual campaign and oversee the development of objectives and all related programs for the GenMTL annual campaign, ensuring that GenMTL donors are properly stewarded, cultivated and recognized for their contributions;
- Establish annual and long-term objectives and metrics for GenMTL, including engagement and fundraising metrics, and metrics to determine effectiveness of transition, intake and data collection;
- Develop and implement a plan to identify, cultivate and nurture emerging and existing GenMTL leadership with the potential to fulfil a wide range of volunteer leadership roles both within Federation CJA and Jewish communal institutions, and extending to the community at large;
- Promote Jewish learning as an important element of Jewish leadership and ensure the provision of Jewish learning opportunities across all age cohorts and within all programs;
- Partner with lay leadership in the oversight of the GenMTL department;
- Collaborate with volunteers to identify, develop and incubate activities in furtherance of GenMTL goals and objectives.

PROFILE

- Bachelor's degree required; Graduate degree preferred.
- A minimum of 5 years' experience in senior management;
- Experienced in change management, in particular in team building;
- Development and management of a budget;
- Experience with program evaluation;
- Experience in building relationships with donors, colleagues, lay leaders and key internal and external stakeholders;
- Ability to articulate and communicate a compelling vision for GenMTL, and to translate the vision into achievable goals, strategies and deliverables.
- Demonstrated passion for and deep knowledge and understanding of Federation CJA mission, program areas and agenda;
- Demonstrated success cultivating donors and canvassing for gifts;
- Strong organizational skills;
- High emotional intelligence, relationship-building and motivational skills;
- Strong written and verbal communications skills;
- Ability to manage and execute on multiple projects simultaneously and work collaboratively with internal and external stakeholders;
- Bilingual: French and English.

EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

Regular full time position with competitive benefits package.

APPLICATION

Interested candidates are invited to submit their resume along with a cover letter to the Human Resources Department, by email, to muriel.alloune@federationcja.org, before February 5, 2016.

New rules could shut preschoolers out of camps

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

Phil Faibish

Lori Hacker's five-year-old son had a great time at Jack and Pat Kay Centre Camp last summer, making new friends, learning new skills, and thriving in a Jewish environment.

"Centre Camp is like a gem in the community," she said. "The level of care and support and fun is second to none."

But she's worried her younger son, who turns three this summer, won't have the same opportunity. Under new child care legislation introduced by Ontario's Ministry of Education, camps must now meet the same licensing requirements as daycares if they serve campers under four years old.

It's a goal that's unrealistic and unnecessary, said Centre Camp director Phil Faibish.

"The act makes sense to help protect children in daycare, but we are a different program," he said.

Centre Camp is accredited by the Ontario Camps Association (OCA), which has more than 400 standards, including protocols about safety, hygiene and the ratio of caregivers to children, that camps must meet, some of which are stricter than the ministry's daycare regulations, he said.

Some of the requirements for daycares make no sense for camps, which operate mainly outdoors and serve children of different ages, Faibish said.

One sticking point is that camps group children by grade to keep friends together, while daycare rules separate kids by age, so that all four-year-olds are in one group.

The new regulations, based on recommendations in the ombudsman of Ontario's report on unlicensed child care, came into effect last August.

"Younger children are a more vulnerable population," Education Ministry spokesperson Gary Wheeler said in an email. "Requiring a child care licence for camps serving children under four years of age places an emphasis on standards and protection."

The OCA is meeting with the ministry of education and hopes to reach a compromise by February or March, which would allow accredited camps to accept preschoolers.

Meanwhile, Faibish has emailed parents of the 75 to 100 affected campers. He said he's "optimistic" the problem will be resolved. "We're telling families to come to camp and save their spot."

If the situation isn't resolved, the camp, which has about 1,000 campers, will issue refunds, but Faibish said he doesn't know what parents will do, since there aren't many daycare spots available.

Hacker has registered her younger son and hopes her two boys will go to camp together this summer. "The government didn't consult with people who pay taxes and work for a living. I don't think they thought this through. Camp is not the same as daycare."

Lubavitch Day Camp, which serves about 700 children, is also accredited by the OCA, but director Ester Steinmetz is working on being licensed as a daycare so she can accept the 60 to 80 preschoolers who attend the camp.

"The parents are in a frenzy," she said. "A lot of camps are closing. I have a lot of applications. I can't take them all."

Getting the proper licensing is an onerous process. "I'm working on a 120-page document I already comply with," she said.

Operating as a daycare means camp will also be more expensive, since early childhood educators are needed for each group, not just counsellors. This will be hard for families whose children had attended smaller, less expensive camps or informal backyard camps, Steinmetz said.

Some camps, especially those not accredited by the OCA, are simply not accepting the youngest campers.

Daniel Opert, director of Camp Eitan Breakaway, decided not to enrol three-year-olds this year, affecting about 15 children. "It's a small group for us," he said. "We might decide to apply [for a daycare licence], but for the time being, we're just not opening for that age."

Other camps that operate as daycares during the school year are extending their licences to cover the summer as well. The summer programs at the Miles Nadal JCC and Torah Tots Preschool are in this situation.

Even so, the camps face obstacles. Torah Tots director Chayala Zarchi said she's always hired certified teachers, but she's still trying to find out if she can also hire the teenage counsellors who give the camp "a fresh energy."

Heather Heagle, executive director of the OCA, said she's "feeling positive" that "some type of a new commitment allowing accredited camps to be exempt from the regulations," can be reached with the Ministry of Education.

The Jewish community, in particular, is highly invested in camping and is "going berserk," about the change in regulations, she said. ■

Jewish disability month seeks to raise awareness

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Inclusivity goes beyond making spaces physically accessible to everyone – other people's attitudes sometimes pose the greatest barriers to those with disabilities, says Liviya Mendelsohn, manager of accessibility and inclusion at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC).

This is one of a host of issues that will be addressed during Toronto's inaugural Jewish Disability Awareness and Inclusion Month (JDAIM), to be held throughout February.

The program – spearheaded by the MNJCC in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's inclusion initiative, Itanu Toronto – will feature dozens of events, including panel discussions, gallery shows, film screenings, recreational activities and workshops.

The purpose is to raise awareness about different types of disabilities and "to get the community focused on identifying and removing barriers, doing outreach and making our community more welcoming to everyone – not just in synagogues but in the arts, culture…[in] every facet of our community," Mendelsohn said.

A piece from the Voicing Perspective exhibit.

First launched in 2009 in Minneapolis, JDAIM has been running for several years in dozens of American cities, plus on a smaller scale in Vancouver and Calgary, with an aim to make accessibility a top priority in the Jewish community.

JDAIM Toronto will raise awareness about "visible and invisible disabilities," meaning those that affect people physically and those related to vision, hearing, mental health or intellectual development.

It will also highlight the connection between Jewish values and promoting attitudes that embrace diversity.

"Everyone who wants to be part of Jewish life should be a part of Jewish life. The Torah teaches about the humanity and dignity of all people. That's what this month is all about," Mendelsohn said.

The program's Toronto debut comes at a moment when the community here has begun to make real strides on the inclusivity front, Mendelsohn said.

The existence of her role at the MNJCC, for example – established last year to improve the accessibility of the centre's facilities, programs and services – is a marker of progress, as is Mendelsohn's new part-time position as inclusion specialist at Itanu Toronto, whose revitalization effort she was hired to lead.

So far, an outgrowth of this is the Inclusive Synagogue Working Group, which was formed following an inclusion conference the MNJCC and Itanu ran last spring for rabbis, educators, social service organizations and Jewish community workers.

Comprising representatives from about 17 Toronto shuls, the group meets monthly to explore initiatives such as building renovations to enhance accessibility, bringing in large-print or Braille prayer books and hiring ASL interpreters for hearing-impaired congregants.

JDAIM's organizers have partnered with a number of organizations, including JVS Toronto, Dani Toronto, Reena, the Toronto Jewish Film Society and the Toronto Public Library, and events are happening around the city.

In keeping with the notion of inclusivity, activities are diverse, including things such as wheel dance – a mixed abilities dance class – accessible yoga, a cooking class, a job search workshop and a session on making organization's websites more accessible.

Larger events include a summit on affordable housing for people with disabilities and a film shown in partnership with the Toronto Jewish Film Festival about the state of disability rights in Israel.

Also, from Jan. 30 to Feb. 24, the MNJCC gallery will feature Voicing Perspective, an exhibit featuring photographs and paintings done by international artists with intellectual and other disabilities.

Mendelsohn emphasized that the Itanu committee and MNJCC's community advisory committee include people with disabilities, who helped to advise on programming.

"Disability touches almost every family in our community. It's not a separate issue but one that includes everyone," she said. ■

Why we must preserve Jewish life outside big cities

Paul Socken

When I was completing my doctorate at the University of Toronto, there were only three jobs in my field in the whole country. I eagerly accepted the offer from the University of Waterloo and started an adventure that would change my life.

Other young Jewish professors came to Waterloo, which was growing in size and reputation. Whether religious or not, most yearned for Jewish fellowship and ended up at Beth Jacob Congregation, then under the stewardship of the legendary Rabbi Philip Rosensweig, whose avuncular nature and great skills were a draw for many of us. We began what became a long journey toward faith and study.

My own move back to Toronto after 17 years in Kitchener-Waterloo was personally enriching in many ways. Still, my mind often wanders back to what was once the only shul in Kitchener-Waterloo, where Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and secular gathered under one roof. The fellowship and mutual respect were heartening.

Nothing comes easily in small Jewish communities. They must be resourceful. Engaged individuals create their own study groups. Smaller communities have a vibrancy, commitment, amity and warmth that are largely unrecognized and unacknowledged. It is unimaginable that you could walk into a synagogue in a small town and not receive a warm welcome.

Jewish life in recent years has gravitated to the big cities to such an extent that it is easy to forget that small towns were once the heart of Jewish life in Canada.

In Europe before World War II, Judaism was a small-town phenomenon. There was Kovno, but there was also Birzei. There were Warsaw and Lodz, but there was also Piotrkow. Judaism survived and thrived on the margins as well as at the centre. The renowned yeshivas of the cities nourished the towns and villages spiritually and intellectually. There was an important relationship between the centres of learning and the knowledgeable and pious Jews throughout the various countries.

European Jews who settled in Canadian towns before and after the war brought with them their knowledge, piety and observance. However, practical circumstances in a new land made adaptation difficult, and compromises were often made. Their integration was a great success and their tenacious determination to maintain Jewish practice in their adopted country for themselves and their families led to the building of shuls and communities. Their spirit lives on.

> The current polarization between town and city is not healthy for the Canadian Jewish family.

The current polarization between town and city is not healthy for the Canadian Jewish family. There are smaller yet significant Jewish centres like Hamilton and London with day schools and amenities, but even they are losing members who are increasingly drawn to the resources of the big cities. Small Jewish centres find it difficult to attract young Jewish families because of the lack of Jewish infrastructure.

If the trend continues and the only viable Jewish communities left are in the big cities, Jewish life in Canada will be unknown in most of the country. That would be a loss for the country and for the remaining Jews spread thinly across this vast land. It would be a blow as well to the diversity of Jewish life in Canada.

The problems are many and the solutions few. At the very least, Canadian Jewish leaders need to put this issue on their radar. Money and effort are being devoted to the revival of Jewish life in Poland, but not in the towns of Canada. And just as philanthropists and leaders have long supported the miracle that is modern Israel – and rightly so – we should also gratefully turn our attention to the small Canadian centres that valiantly carry on and enrich the fabric of Canadian Jewish life. ■

Moncton Jews still remember the community's roots

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Jewish community in Moncton, N.B., was founded around 1900 by a group of 22 Jewish families that arrived from the town of Darbenai, Lithuania. All of the families settled on a single street in town. They built the synagogue in 1926 and founded the Jewish cemetery in 1930.

Such are the memorable roots of the city's present Jewish community, which numbers about 150 people, down from a peak of about 250 in decades past. Distinguished Jewish citizens have included former Moncton mayor Michael Baig, who served in the late 1950s, and Reuben Cohen, the recently deceased lawyer and multi-billion-dollar financier who was chancellor of Dalhousie University and a recipient of the Order of Canada.

As in other Jewish communities in the Maritimes, a group of about five or six Jewish families from Israel has helped bolster Moncton's Jewish population in recent years.

"It's a good thing that the Israeli families have come, because most of them have young children," said Dr. Francis Weil, former president and current vice-president of Moncton's Jewish community. Weil was born in France in 1938 and came as a young man to Moncton, where he taught physics and statistics at the French-language Université de Moncton.

Children attend a menorah lighting at the Moncton Hospital.

Tiferes Israel, the original synagogue of 1926, was enlarged with an addition that included a mikvah around 1983. The cost of roughly $600,000 was funded largely through a lottery.

"We sold quite a number of tickets to people outside the community," Weil said, an indicator of the general support Moncton Jews receive from the rest of the city. Their annual Holocaust Remembrance event on Yom Hashoah usually attracts 100 to 120 people, mostly non-Jews.

Moncton has the second-largest Jewish community in Atlantic Canada, yet the community is a small minority of the town's population. More than 100,000 people, one-third of whom are francophone, live in the metropolitan area. Anti-Semitic incidents are rare.

Halifax, located 2-1/2 hours away by car, has the largest Jewish community in Atlantic Canada with about 1,500 Jews. Small Jewish communities are also located in Fredericton and Saint John, N.B. The closest, very large Jewish community is in Montreal, some 10 hours away by car.

Rabbi Yitzhak Yagod, the part-time spiritual leader of Tiferes Israel, visits for one weekend a month. His wife is in town more often and provides Jewish education for young people. "We now have about 20 or 25 kids, so the rebbetzin organizes a whole range of activities with them besides the cheder."

Keeping kosher in Moncton can be a challenge. "The main problem is the meat," Weil said. "We can get frozen meat, but we can't get meat otherwise. Sometimes two or three families get together to have one big order and have it shipped in." Passover foods may likewise be ordered in advance from a store in Fredericton.

The congregation hosts an annual Chanukah dinner, a Purim event and a late-August barbecue along the shore in nearby Shediac. It also presents several speakers on Jewish topics each year.

There is no question that the community is dwindling. Although some young doctors and lawyers have returned and started families in recent years, young people who leave to attend university elsewhere typically don't come back.

Thirty years ago, the synagogue maintained a system of reserved seats on the High Holidays to ensure that everyone had a seat. "Now, at Yom Kippur, only half the synagogue is occupied," Weil observed.

However, according to Weil, many people live to a ripe old age in Moncton. "At one time, in our population of about 150 Jews, we had nine people over the age of 90," he said. "If you had called me a year ago, there would have been four more people over the age of 90 than today.

"I use this to try to convince people to come to Moncton," he continued. "You can live to a good old age here." ■

JGH's new $429-million pavilion opens

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The Jewish General Hospital's (JGH) new $429-million wing has finally fully opened almost six years after its construction was first announced.

The 10-storey Pavilion K, with its main entrance on Légaré Street, admitted its first patients on Jan. 24, although the project's first phase, an emergency department, much larger and more modern than the previous one, has been in operation since February 2014.

Health Minister Gaétan Barrette, as well as Natural Resources Minister Pierre Arcand, MNA for the area riding of Mont Royal, were on hand for the official ribbon-cutting in the pavilion's cavernous Agora concourse on Jan. 18.

Barrette praised the JGH for completing the project on budget, and for the excellence of its patient care. The expansion of the JGH will benefit not only Montrealers, but all of Quebec, he said, providing more efficient and safer care.

The opening followed many months of preparation to familiarize staff with their new work environment and to ensure the smooth transfer of patients.

While the government paid for the building, the Jewish General Hospital Foundation is responsible for the underground garage and all equipment and furnishings inside the edifice, for which fundraising continues.

The new pavilion focuses on acute care, housing the intensive care, cardiovascular care and neonatal intensive care units, as well as the birthing centre and operating rooms.

All patient rooms are private.

In total, 18 departments are being moved into the tower, where approximately 60 per cent of the JGH's clinical activities will soon be performed. The JGH's total number of beds – 637 – remains the same.

Later, the cafeteria will be relocated and revamped with five kiosks offering different foods. The pavilion is connected internally to the rest of the hospital via the Agora, into which the neighbouring former Herzl clinic building has been integrated.

In addition to the latest equipment and technology, the pavilion has a pneumatic system that whisks dirty laundry and garbage away, freeing workers for more patient-centred tasks. There are also such amenities as a lounge for visitors.

One of the pavilion's most striking features is the natural light through large windows that afford spectacular views on the upper floors.

Alan Maislin, who since October has been the minister-appointed chair of the board of directors of the Integrated Health and Social Services University Network for West-Central Montreal, one of the new health agencies known by the acronym CIUSSS, said the pavilion was conceived at least 10 years ago.

The agency's CEO, Dr. Lawrence Rosenberg, called it "the most ambitious and complicated" expansion in the JGH's 82-year history due to its design and innovation.

First announced in June 2010, the project's completion target date at that time for the ER was 2012.

The go-ahead for the main part of the pavilion, the largest ever expansion of patient-care facilities, was approved by the government in October 2011. At the time, the pavilion was expected to open at the end of 2014.

Then D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman was credited with persuading his government to move ahead with the project. Bergman, who was present for the opening ceremony, was applauded for his role in realizing the pavilion.

The project's progress was delayed when Barrette put construction on hold in 2014 while the JGH got its finances under control. At the time, it was running a more than $14-million deficit.

That year the JGH also become the subject of an investigation by the province's anti-corruption squad, UPAC, for construction cost overruns related to the expansion. The JGH co-operated fully with the inquiry, which was narrowed to specific hospital suppliers and contractors.

The JGH has maintained that its ballooning deficit was due to the high demand for its services, especially cancer care, which was exceeding its government funding year after year.

At the inauguration, Barrette made a commitment that government funding will keep pace with the demand for services provided at the new facility.

The pavilion "can run at full capacity," he said. "I can say without hesitation that we will fund it correctly."

D'Arcy McGee MNA David Birnbaum, who could not be present, echoed that in a letter sent to Rosenberg and Allan Rubin, JGH board of governors president. "[Barrette] will surely reiterate his continued support and admiration for the cutting-edge medical leadership that the hospital has always demonstrated. Surely, Pavilion K will be another manifestation of that leadership, as it adds to the full range of quality patient services offered by the Montreal Centre-West CIUSSS." ■

Why I still support a shared society in Israel

Rabbi Boruch Perton

What I am going to write is not politically correct. Not just that, but it goes against the opinion of many Jewish leaders. I've always been a person who goes against the stream. However this time is different. I risk causing pain to people who are grieving recent losses. This makes what I am going to say so much more difficult.

It is easy to be a peace activist and believer in a shared society when things are calm and stable. When there are recent orphans and widows to mourn, it is so much harder. Cries of vengeance and retaliation are being broadcast in the media and spoken from the pulpit in many congregations. To publicly come out and say that the dream of peaceful coexistence and a shared society with the Palestinians is still something we as a people need to aspire to is not in vogue. At worst, it's offensive.

But I am still a believer.

There are many questions regarding the current crisis in Israel. Are these latest attacks the result of manipulation for a political agenda? Are they a message from Fatah or Hamas that they can turn on the terror switch at any time? Are those perpetrating these vile acts frustrated with their lives? Do they see no other solution to bring awareness to their plight? Or is it just simply, good old-fashioned anti-Semitism showing its rawest, ugliest face?

Having been an educator for over 25 years in both Israel and North America, there is one thing that I have learned from dealing with disciplinary issues: if you do not address the root cause of misbehaviour, conduct will never change. If you only deal in a punitive manner with the symptoms, you will never change the behaviour.

The same basic logic needs to be applied to the Israeli-Palestinian issue.

Many people tell me: "The Palestinians have it so good, why are they doing this?" The truth is, they do have it good. Compare the life of the average Israeli-Palestinian with the life of the average Arab in the Middle East. They have excellent health care and educational and employment opportunities. So why are they angry? And if they are being manipulated, why don't they ignore the message from their political leaders?

> The only solution is to invest and to commit to creating a more inclusive society.

The answer is no matter how many opportunities they have, they are still second-class citizens. Their point of reference is not Saudi Arabia or Iraq. It's Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

In Haifa, there is a branch of Hand in Hand, a network of bilingual, mixed Jewish-Arab schools. When I recently visited the campus, I learned that the Arab parents are significantly more affluent than the Jewish parents. I also learned that these Arab families are members of a shared society, living and working next door to their Jewish neighbours. But this does not lead to intermarriage or a polluting of either community's values or traditions. Rather it creates opportunities to build bridges, friendships and success. The Arabs in Haifa feel like they are part of the city and country.

There have been no attacks to date in Haifa. The same can be said for Acre, where Jews and Arabs live together in a shared society as well.

The solution in the short term may be to build more walls, put up more roadblocks and checkpoints, and have a greater military presence in areas that are under attack. However, in the long term, this will never solve the problem.

The only solution is to invest and to commit to creating a more inclusive society. This will allow for equal opportunities and healthy and productive interaction with our closest neighbours. After all, even if there were to be a Palestinian state tomorrow, there would still be more than 1.5 million Palestinians in Israel who are not going anywhere.

A shared society is the only long-term, viable solution. ■

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem mourns the passing of Sydney Gangbar, a founder and member of the Board of Governors of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. We are indebted to Mr. Gangbar for his dedication to implementing the vision and mission of Yad Vashem, Jerusalem, in Canada.

Sydney Gangbar was a man of great conviction, serving in the Royal Canadian Navy during the Second World War. Returning from the horrors of combat, Mr. Gangbar became a lawyer and a founder of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. His devotion to the Canadian Society has made it possible for the lessons of the Holocaust to be disseminated to thousands of Canadians across the country.

May the memory of Sydney Gangbar bring comfort to his family and may his considerable legacy live on through the lives of his adored children and cherished grandchildren.

Plan for Jewish museum on planetarium site dropped

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Plans to erect the Jewish Museum of Canada as part of the University of Toronto's new Centre for Civilizations and Cultures have been scrapped indefinitely.

In September 2014, Isadore Sharp, the philanthropist and founder of the Four Season's hotel chain, along with U of T and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, announced that a Jewish museum would be built at the university's new cultural and educational centre at 90 Queen's Park Cres., beside the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM). It was once the site of the McLaughlin Planetarium, formerly owned by the ROM, which currently leases the now-shuttered building from the university for storage.

But Sharp – who committed $20 million toward the $150-million project, hoping the museum would "tell the world what our people has contributed over the generations" and would serve as "a voice for the Jewish community" – told The CJN last week that the plan has been dropped, at least for now.

The $150-million project was announced in September 2014.

Isadore Sharp

> It's something the federation might do sometime in the future.

"At this stage, it's all being put on hold and it is up to the federation sometime in the future if they wish to proceed with it," Sharp said.

Steve Shulman, campaign director for UJA Federation, explained that the federation's role was to act as a "community representative and steward of the community's interest in this and to be supportive in any way possible.

"This project was really a great vision that the Sharps had, and they are to be commended for their initiative, but I think ultimately... the university wanted to move ahead in a very short period of time, which was particularly challenging, and I think from UJA's standpoint, we are in a situation where we also have particular priorities in terms of the vulnerable in our community, Jewish education, identity, Jewish advocacy connection with Israel, etc., in our capital campaign.

"You never know, something could arise in another location in the future, but I think right now, there was a very short window in terms of time in that location."

U of T is moving ahead with the development of the former planetarium, which opened in 1968 and closed in 1995. The project will include a 250-seat performance hall for the university's nearby faculty of music, as well as space for the school's department of history, the department of Near and Middle Eastern civilizations, the Institute of Islamic Studies, and a research arm for the Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies.

"This was a wonderful opportunity that the university was offering to us. They have a project that they are moving forward with, and they certainly wanted [the museum] to be part of it, but we had a timeline to work on it, and it just wasn't feasible with the commitments that had already been made by federation," Sharp said.

"This just became one more additional fundraising effort, and the timing wasn't appropriate. We just couldn't see a way of raising the amount of money needed to make sure that it wasn't going to be a burden, and we wanted to do everything to make it self-sustaining."

Of the $150-million price tag, $65 million was for an endowment to fund the museum's expenses and make it self-sustaining. The facility was to have featured state-of-the-art permanent and temporary exhibits, including a permanent one on the Holocaust.

"It could happen someplace else, and certainly at a different time," Sharp said.

"It's something the federation might do sometime in the future." ■

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
Under 40 Initiative UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, among the most dynamic Jewish Federations in North America, is launching a new initiative focusing on the Under 40 cohort.

The vision for the Under 40 (ages 22-40) strategy is to use UJA Federation's existing array of outreach programs to engage and cultivate relationships with as many young adults as possible; expand those relationships to have a philanthropic component; and develop those with the right skills to become community leaders.

The successful candidate will lead a cross-departmental team of professionals, working with young leaders and leaders in the business and philanthropic communities, to build a systematic approach to fulfill UJA Federation's vision for philanthropy and leadership in our community.

REQUIREMENTS:

- Bachelor's degree in Jewish communal work, public policy, management, or related field of study.
- Minimum of five years in leadership roles at Jewish communal or comparable institutions, including some direct supervisory experience.
- Experience managing complex systems with multiple stakeholders; in change management and team building; working with strategic plans, with the ability to translate into achievable goals, strategies and deliverables.
- Knowledge and understanding of UJA Federation's mission, programs, and vision.
- Proficiency in computer skills and social media.
- Strong written and oral communication skills in order to articulate a compelling vision.
- Charismatic, creative, resourceful, and passionate leader who will inspire the team to develop and implement innovative programming.

DESIRABLES:

- Masters degree in a relevant discipline; fundraising experience; prior success working in the Under 40/ young adult sphere; familiarity with and understanding of the Toronto and/or Canadian Jewish community.

This is a permanent position with a leadership salary and excellent benefits.
Evening and weekend work may be required.

Dafna Meir's family refuses to give in to hatred

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Renana Meir was on the phone with a friend when she heard her mother scream. At first, the 17-year-old thought her mother had seen a cockroach, but quickly realized something terrible was happening.

The teenager rushed to investigate, and found her mother wrestling with the Palestinian teenager who had fatally stabbed her.

"When I walked in, she was already on the ground, I saw them struggling and I screamed in panic," Renana told the Srugim news website last week.

"He was trying to get the knife out of her body to attack us, but she wouldn't let him," Renana said. "She wouldn't let him take the knife out of her, she didn't let him hurt us," she said.

Renana and her father Natan gave several interviews last week, speaking tearfully of Dafna's joy and positivity, insistently refusing to entertain bitterness or express hatred in the wake of her murder.

Natan Meir also revealed that he had invited a longtime Palestinian friend, who is a relative of the murderer, to come to the home and that this friend indeed visited.

Speaking to Channel 2 on Jan.20, Renana said she hoped her own screams had helped scare off the killer, later identified as Morad Bader Abdullah Adais. He was arrested at his home the night of Jan. 18. His father, who denies knowing that his son was planning the attack, has reportedly told Palestinian news outlets he is proud of his son, but relatives denied this to Israeli TV.

Renana said that after the terrorist ran off, leaving her mother for dead, she initially tried to remove the knife. "But then I remembered my Magen David Adom training, that you don't remove any 'foreign object.'"

Renana Meir, right, is comforted at her mother's funeral last week.

"I asked her to keep breathing and not to stop no matter what, but already I knew that it was over," she told Srugim. "My mom tried to keep breathing, and I felt like she heard me talking to her even though she didn't respond.

"I really hope that she didn't hear all my screaming," Renana said. "First I called the paramedics, and then I called my father."

"It felt like forever before the ambulance came," she told Channel 2.

"She really was like a best friend to me; we didn't have the regular mother-daughter relationship," Renana said. "We talked about everything; she was always there for me. Our family, us, her children were her entire world."

Dafna, 38, a nurse, left behind her husband Natan, and four children aged 11 to 17. The Meir family was also fostering two children, both below the age of five. "Obviously" the two foster children would remain with the family after Dafna's murder, her husband said.

Natan Meir told Srugim that he heard his wife was dead on the radio.

"I was at the doctor's office with our youngest when Renana called me to tell me a terrorist stabbed her mother," he said. "And when I called her back, all Renana told me was 'they're taking care of mom.'

"I got in the car and turned on the radio, I heard on the news that a woman in Otniel had been murdered. I turned off the radio, I knew it was her," Natan said.

"I'm thankful for every minute I had with Dafna," he said tearfully. "I loved her from the minute we met when we were both soldiers until her very last day," he said. "I'll always remember her curly hair peeking out from under her winter hat."

In an interview to the Yedioth Ahronoth daily on Jan. 19, Natan said he harboured no anger towards Palestinians in general for his wife's death.

"We don't have anger," he said. "I am not angry at anyone. We don't fill ourselves with that. We don't curse Arabs. I sit and talk with my kids and I haven't heard a single word of that. We're not people who hate. Dafna and I weren't brought up that way."

Natan Meir told Channel 2 that a Palestinian who lives in a nearby village came to the home to pay a condolence call earlier in the day, at his invitation. This Palestinian, a longtime friend, Natan said, is a relative of the 16-year-old who killed his wife.

"I am certain that had he known, he would have stopped that terrorist from coming here, even if it cost him his life," Natan said of this Palestinian friend. "Our friendship is much stronger than that. I asked all my friends, everybody, Jews and non-Jews, to come (to the shivah). We are good friends. The tears in his eyes showed that." ■

No Palestinian state in the West Bank, Israeli minister says

STUART WINER
JERUSALEM

Israeli Education Minister Naftali Bennett said that only when Palestinians accept that they will never have a state in the West Bank will they be able to live side-by-side with Israelis.

Bennett, who leads the settlement-backing Jewish Home party, made the comments on Jan. 24 at the settlement of Tekoa, south of Jerusalem, where he was joined by fellow party members Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked and MK Shuli Moalem-Refaeli for a tree-planting ceremony ahead of the Jewish agricultural festival of Tu b'Shvat.

"Since the dawn of Zionism there's been terror, and the answer was always settlement and attack," Bennett said, according to a report on the Hebrew-language Srugim website. "The terrorists act in the hope of breaking us. Only when they understand that we are flourishing, only when they understand that there is no expectation of a Palestinian state here, will they be comfortable with our existence."

The Jewish Home party officials' visit to the settlement came in solidarity after the Jan. 15 incident in which resident Michal Froman was stabbed by a 15-year-old Palestinian, Othman Muhammad Sha'alan. The tree was planted outside the local school, near where the attack took place.

Froman, five months' pregnant, was moderately injured and Sha'alan was shot in the leg and apprehended by security forces.

"The spirit of the Jewish people cannot be broken, and from within the great disaster we will continue to plant and to flourish, and to develop the settlement project in the beloved Land of Israel," Shaked, the justice minister, said. "The Jewish people wants to live in its country in peace and with a feeling of security.

"Those who wish us harm want bloodshed and to uproot us from our homes; we saw proof of that last Sunday, in the loathsome attack in which Dafna Meir was murdered," she continued, referring to the killing of Dafna Meir, 39, who was stabbed outside her home in the West Bank settlement of Otniel by 15-year-old Palestinian Morad Bader Abdullah Adais on Jan. 14. ■

Significance of Israeli minister's visit to UAE debated

ROBERT SWIFT

The fact that Israel's Minister for Energy flew to Abu Dhabi demonstrates that the Jewish state is conducting secret communications with Gulf Sunni states in response to the common threat of Iran. Or it doesn't. It depends who you ask.

Israeli television reported that Yuval Steinitz attended a conference on energy in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) earlier this month. Channel 2 suggested that the real purpose of the delegation was to conduct secret strategic communications between Israel and the Gulf state. The principle reason for such a clandestine liaison is mutual distrust of Iran and concern for the general instabilities of the region, not least of which is the Islamic State (ISIS).

A decision by Steinitz's office not to comment on the nature of the trip has only added fuel to the speculation.

Iran is currently entangled in a proxy-conflict with Saudi Arabia and its allied Gulf neighbours – among them the UAE, Qatar, and Bahrain. Israel also sees Iran as a threat on account of its nuclear research and frequent public proclamations about the desired destruction of the Zionist state. This has created common ground between Jerusalem and the Gulf states, but resentment toward Israel arising from the state's perceived treatment of the Palestinians has thus far rendered an open alliance against Tehran impossible.

The minister's carbon footprint aside, it is not unusual for Israel to conduct low-key diplomacy which it does with a number of countries, including its very successful and equally under-reported relationship with Azerbaijan.

"Israel has always had some clandestine or secret relationship with Arab countries… it is known that it has a relationship with several of the Gulf countries," Ely Karmon, a senior research scholar at the International Institute for Counter-Terrorism at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, told the Media Line. The quiet partnership the country enjoys with Egypt and Jordan are examples of what can develop out of such clandestine diplomacy, Karmon suggested.

In the wake of the optimism heralded by the Oslo Accords in the '90s, Israel actually conducted diplomatic missions in the Gulf. But these came to an abrupt end with the start of the second intifadah Karmon explained.

Abdulkhaleq Abdulla, a professor of political science from the UAE, was dismissive of such notions. "There is not much of a relationship…it is not systematic, it's sporadic and doesn't amount to much of substance." Essentially the mutual threat from Iran was not enough to make Gulf Arabs forget that "Israel still occupies Arab lands," Abdulla said.

Steinitz's visit to an energy conference should not be taken out of context and does not demonstrate contact with the UAE's government, the professor said, adding "There is not much that Israel could provide that we could not receive from Turkey, Pakistan and the European states."

This is exactly the type of denial that the location of the meeting was designed to facilitate. "It's to everyone's convenience to deny it," Eran Segal, associate researcher at the Ezri Centre for Iran and Persian Gulf Studies at Haifa University said. Evidence of the governments' ongoing relationship can be found if you dig deep enough, Segal said. Flights running between the UAE and Israel are a good indication of that, he suggested.

It is impossible to know for certain what goes on behind closed doors, but one party, Israel, has an interest in exaggerating the significance of such events, Abdulla said. "Israel wants to make a big deal out of it for its own reasons: to gain legitimacy in the Arab world, to make the Israeli public feel it is not isolated, but it is isolated," he said. While "daily atrocities" continue against Palestinians, any idea of an alliance between Gulf states and Israel is totally unfounded, he concluded.

In this regard, his view and that of the Israeli academic are not dissimilar. "As long as the Palestinian conflict is not viewed as in the process of being solved, I don't think this (relationship) will ever become public," Eran Segal said, noting that under-the-radar co-operation would continue. ■

Iran a bigger danger than ISIS, consul general warns

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca, TORONTO

Despite last year's deal to stall its plans to develop nuclear weapons, Iran remains a bigger threat to Israel and the West than ISIS, the Israeli Consul General to Toronto and Western Canada said during a briefing presented by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs by teleconference last Friday.

"ISIS is a real threat. Our assessment is that Iran remains a larger threat in the bigger picture," DJ Schneeweiss said. "Our concern is that in the rush to try to address ISIS, we make a mistake in forgetting about the Iranian side of it and folding Iran into the effort to defeat ISIS."

"We have not seen a strategic shift in the Iranian agenda and Iranian intentions and it's a crucial thing... In this case, the deal that has been signed is one that has curtailed or delayed Iranian intentions, but it has not been secured as a function of an Iranian choice to abandon those ambitions."

Schneeweiss said that the original demand by the P5+1 countries was that there could be inspections at any time without warning. This was meant to give the West confidence that it could properly monitor whether Iran was living up to its part of the deal.

"But 'anytime, anywhere inspections' were abandoned – that was one of the prices that the P5 +1 had to abandon in order to secure Iranian agreement."

He said other aspects of the agreement, such as shutting the nuclear reactors down, were only temporary.

"Those will end after 10 years, or 15 years. So yes, we may have put off the threat of an Iranian bomb for a few years, but ... 10 years from now, if the world is not careful, we will see an unrestrained Iran with an ability to develop nuclear weapons with the full glories of international legitimacy."

He said the Israeli position on Iran will not soften or "go softly into the dark."

"Iran continues to prosecute a proxy war against Israel through Hezbollah and now has approximately 100,000 rockets pointed at Israeli civilians and 240 villages in Southern Lebanon have been converted into rocket assault bases. Hezbollah and Iran have an ongoing military involvement in Syria. Iran is also intervening in Gaza and funding Hamas there. Iran is developing ballistic missiles and even intercontinental ballistic missiles, all of which are against explicit international commitments that have forced the UN and the United States to re-instigate sanctions against Iran on that file."

DJ Schneeweiss

He said Israel will continue to monitor those developments and warn against violations.

Switching to the topic of terror attacks on Israelis, he said since the beginning of October, Israel has suffered 110 stabbing attacks, 38 shootings, and 22 deliberate vehicle ramming attacks.

"How we address it is the big question. In terms of analysis, there are a lot of young people who are involved in this. People who don't yet have the wisdom of age, but have been exposed to the kinds of materials and ideas that make them particularly vulnerable and particularly dangerous," he said.

"There are questions that need to be asked of the Palestinian leadership and those who see themselves as friends of the Palestinians. What is being done to end the abuse of the younger generation of Palestinians? What is being done to encourage a more self-serving approach to life?"

Schneeweiss said that apart from the damage it causes to both Israelis and Palestinians individually, the violence diminishes support for a territorial compromise from Israel, which is necessary for the potential establishment of a Palestinian state.

"The only way the Israeli public is going to agree to the kinds of concessions that would be required of Israel for such a deal, the only way that is going to happen is if the Israeli public is going to be assured that handing over that territory is not suicidal." ■

Will this violence ever end?

Yair Lootsteen

There's no end in sight to this current round of violence.

Last week was very troubling. On Jan. 17, a terrorist infiltrated Otniel, a West Bank settlement in the Southern Hebron Hills. He randomly entered a home and stabbed 38-year-old Dafna Meir to death in her kitchen. Dafna was a respected naturopathic nurse who worked in her own community and at Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva. She was well known for helping women with gynecological issues.

At home with three of her six children when the terrorist intruded, she did all she could to prevent him from reaching those children. Apparently, her screams scared him away after he'd completed his cowardly act of hatred.

The next day, a different terrorist stabbed Michal Froman in Tekoa, another West Bank settlement, not far from Bethlehem. Froman's father-in-law was renowned Rabbi Menachem Froman, an exceptional West Bank religious leader who promoted interfaith dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians.

Michal was at a second-hand clothing warehouse in Tekoa's industrial zone when the terrorist entered. Asked to leave, he pulled out a knife, chased several women, reached Michal and stabbed her in the shoulder, then fled.

Roughly 30, Michal is pregnant. She knew Dafna. She's recovering at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Center. Thankfully, the attack did no damage to her fetus.

Upon hearing of her stabbing, Shivi, Michal's husband, raced to the hospital. He was held up in traffic caused by Dafna's funeral procession. I heard him on the radio as he described his prayer-filled journey to the hospital.

At Dafna's funeral, her teenage daughter Renana, who had witnessed her murder, apologized to her mother for not doing enough to try to save her.

Later that day, Michal described how she'd looked into her assailant's eyes. More than wanting to kill her, she saw someone wanting to die. He didn't. As he fled the scene, this 15-year-old from Bethlehem was shot in the leg and severely wounded.

During the radio interview, I heard Shivi speak of using both hands to deal with the present situation – one, with all necessary power, to eliminate the nefarious forces of evil, and the other extended to good people on the other side willing to make peace. What happened to Michal had not changed his views.

> Renewed dialogue between the sides is what's needed

On Jan. 19, while driving my son to school, we learned that Dafna's killer had been apprehended during the night. The Shin Bet got information he'd returned home after the attack, to his village just a few kilometres from Otniel. IDF special forces had literally plucked the 16-year-old from his bed as he slept. Apparently his act of terror was revenge for the death of a cousin who'd been shot while trying to stab a soldier not long ago.

I continued that morning to a doctor's appointment with a specialist I'd never visited before. In a distinctly Israeli way, after the examination, we somehow discovered we were both colonels, 50-somethings still serving in the IDF reserves – he a doctor in a serious combat unit, me a lawyer.

We discussed the news of the day. He's all for a peaceful solution with the Palestinians, but none is in the offing, and with continuing violence against innocent Israelis, novel means of deterrence must be employed, he said. Young Palestinians perpetrating terrorist acts must know their families will suffer because of their actions.

We lawyers, he added, should be less restrictive, more creative in allowing acts of deterrence. Administrative detentions, house demolitions and the like are no longer enough. Expel their families to Gaza, Lebanon and Syria.

"Easier said than done," I replied because of international law on collective punishment. In any event, his suggestions were more tactical than strategic. Renewed dialogue between the sides is what's needed.

I reminded him he had other patients outside. We agreed to continue our discussion the next time I visited. I was sombre as I left the clinic. He's right. I'm right.

Dafna and Michal. Twenty-eight Israelis killed since September. Hundreds injured.

When will this end? ■

Deep in the jungle, the Jews of Iquitos cling to tradition

If Iquitos is a city hidden in the jungle, its Jews are a community hidden deeper therein.

The Cementerio de Iquitos is big and beautiful, with 15-foot-tall rows of graves cast in cement, variously painted bright pink and baby blue and divided by smooth marble graves built with personal benches and decorated with flowers. On top of one little girl's affluent tomb stood a five-foot-tall pink castle covered in ribbons, flowers and a Hello Kitty balloon.

But we couldn't find the Jews, so we asked a security guard, who pointed us to the grounds' far southwest corner. There we spied a relatively small gated-off section marked by a tiny placard that read "CEMENTERIO ISRAELITA."

The Jewish section is a bit depressing after seeing the grandeur of what Catholics do for their dead. Only half full, several tombstones are cracked and broken, and there's no colour beyond the green of the long-uncut grass. A lone palm tree offers some shade from the blistering sun, but there are no flowers lain peacefully on the fewer than 70 graves – only a handful of small grey stones strewn across the tops.

Still, there is something inspiring about seeing a Star of David this far into the world – these people, Davids in Goliath's country, staunchly buried in the ground for as long as the city stands. That the Jewish section is only half full felt at first dismal, but then hopeful, as if they really expected to fill it one day.

Everything Jewish in Iquitos is like this, quiet but proud, hidden but obvious if you know where to look. We learned this once we returned to the downtown core, and, after enjoying a cone of aguaje ice cream from Ari's Burger in the central plaza, traced the street numbers to find the synagogue.

At least, we thought it was the synagogue. Inside, all we saw were two bored employees standing next to heaps of foam mattresses, a broad wooden table and spools of colourful 10-foot-wide vinyl.

We asked them, awkwardly, if this was a place where Jews gathered, and the two employees glanced at each other and sighed as one of them headed into a dark back room separated only by a thin sheet, returning with a squat man in his 60s, maybe five-foot-six, wearing loose-fitting pleated slacks, a checked shirt and an inquisitive look on his face.

This was Jorge Abramovitz, leader of the Amazonian Jews.

There aren't many opportunities for tradition here, but there is one they stick to.

Every Friday at 7 p.m., some 40-odd Iquiteño Jews gather in the backroom synagogue Jorge runs out of his house for the Kabbalat Shabbat service. They recite the prayers, from Lechu Neranena to Lechah Dodi; they enjoy shot glasses of wine and slices of homemade bread; and they sway, back and forth, arms-over-shoulders, connected in a circle, singing Shalom Aleichem over the heavy jungle rain pitter-pattering on the tin roof above.

They've been doing this ever since Jorge transformed his back room in 2002 – something he never wanted to do in the first place. "It was a big commitment," he explained. When he bought the sizable property, he moved his family into the middle part – there are bedrooms connected to a central courtyard, which they use as a living room, as well as an office to the side and space for his mattress business out front. It was his wife's idea to open up the back as a makeshift synagogue. After all, where else could they congregate?

Jorge's property is magnificent. A cracked wooden front door leads to a grungy staircase, dimly lit and painted with blue Assyrian Hebrew script. At the top of the stairs there is a gorgeous open-air hallway, adorned with crawling leafy vines and Zionist posters quoting Theodore Herzl, which leads to their synagogue, filled only by a modest array of blue plastic chairs, a wide Israeli flag strung up in the back and some lingering Chanukah decorations, seemingly made by children, taped to the porous white walls.

When we first descended into the synagogue, we met Rifka, Jorge's wife. Her first question: "Have you seen our Torah yet?" She gestured to the large wooden case standing in the corner, donated to them with the book by a wealthy New York couple in 2009, even though nobody in Iquitos can speak or read Hebrew fluently.

Still, their religious pride is obvious. When we sat down with them upon our first meeting, they quickly and eagerly launched into a list of famous Jewish Iquiteños: Victor Israel, who founded the city's Jewish society in 1911; Saloman Joseph Dreyfus, local mayor from 1952 to 1956; Dora Toledano Godier, voted Miss Peru in 1963.

'It's not easy being Jewish here,' local leader acknowledges

Then they dove into the history of the Amazonian Jews, starting with the rubber boom in 1880, when Moroccan Sephardim arrived in Iquitos by way of Manaus, Brazil. Businessmen and politicians, they enjoyed four decades of prosperous assimilation before World War I, when the rubber boom busted and 75 per cent of the Jewish community left for opportunities elsewhere. The Cohen building we'd seen earlier was sold during this exodus, along with several other large downtown properties built by Jews, later given up or forgotten.

The mid-20th century was a quiet era for Iquiteño Jews, their religion cultivated and defined by isolation. Before the Iquitos airport was built near the end of the 20th century, Jorge says, it took two months to reach Lima by riverboat – but only 18 days to sail to Europe. Because of this, they've always been spiritually closer to European Jews than Limeños, (Lima residents) a fact which likely exacerbated the pseudo-rivalry that persists today.

"It's not easy being Jewish here," Jorge acknowledged. Limeños have a network – their community is more than a thousand strong. Here, they can't even keep kosher, because they have no local rabbis; they can do little more than avoid pork. But Jorge is just as quick to point out how much more gratifying it is to be the underdog. "We feel more connected to Judaism," he said.

Left behind in Iquitos are the 60 or 70 Jews who have no desire to leave home, who still attend the weekly Kabbalat Shabbat meetings in Jorge's synagogue. Rifka estimates there are hundreds more Iquiteños oblivious to their Jewish heritage, but, as she told us, "It's not as if we can knock on their doors and ask, 'Hey, do you know where your last name is from?'"

There are two demographics of Iquiteño Jews: kids and parents. Anyone in between, those 20-and 30-somethings, are the ones making aliyah, leaving a working-age gap in the local Jewish population. When I asked whether that worried Rifka, she acknowledged it did. "This is the problem we're facing," she said. "Who will continue our tradition?" Her own son and daughter moved to Israel in 2011 and 2013; Jorge and Rifka have never been able to visit.

On Fridays, Jorge's synagogue is packed with these split demographics. Of the 36 people there that night, roughly a third were small children – fidgeting, sleeping, shouting obliviously loudly about their hunger. Six metal fans hung from the walls, but only four worked, so we fanned ourselves with our Sinagoga Lehavat Jaim Sidur prayer books.

Sebastien, a sharp and quiet 17 year old, sat at the front of the room and led the service – the men rotate this responsibility each week – fluidly moving from Hebrew prayers to Spanish stories over the next hour, his voice intermittently drowned out by the rain violently rattling the tin roof over our heads.

And then, at the end, the tradition: everyone moved their chairs off to the side and side-hugged their neighbour. Rifka looked excitedly at me, pleased that I should witness their strength and unity. We formed a large circle, linked at the shoulders, and began gently swaying left to right; though I hadn't sung Shalom Aleichem in years, the words came back to me, and it felt oddly comforting to know that, for the first time this entire trip, I could speak the same language as those who live here.

Despite all the hardships, this tribe of Jews, tucked away among the vines and palms of the Amazon, has persevered. That is, after all, what this religion is all about. As Rifka told us with more than a hint of pride, "Here, it's difficult to be Jewish."

Difficult, yes. But not impossible. ■

Canadian doc about Claude Lanzmann up for an Oscar

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After a more than four-decade career making some of the most accomplished documentaries of all time, Claude Lanzmann may finally be heading to the Academy Awards on Feb. 28.

However, if the 90-year-old documentarian behind Shoah does find his way to the Dolby Theatre, it won't be for one of his own films. Lanzmann is the subject of one of the nominated documentary shorts, directed by Toronto resident Adam Benzine.

"What I hope this [nomination] will do is expose his work to a whole new generation," Benzine tells The CJN. "Shoah had such an influence on the documentary landscape. It's such a singular work of cinema."

The nomination for documentary short subject is a big achievement for Benzine, an arts journalist and first-time filmmaker who arrived in Canada in 2011. Claude Lanzmann: Spectres of the Shoah was a self-financed film that he worked on with a mostly Canadian crew for three years.

Most of the documentary short is an intimate interview with Lanzmann as the director revisits his experience making Shoah, a nearly 10-hour documentary about the Holocaust.

Shoah was groundbreaking, not just for its scope, but also for its lack of archive footage. Lanzmann began working on the film when he was 47, but the gruelling production and editing process took more than 10 years – and almost made him take his own life.

"I was proud of what I achieved," Lanzmann says in the film about the reception of his 1985 documentary. "But joy – joy is something else."

Spectres of the Shoah, which runs 40 minutes, also features previously unseen footage taken from 225 hours of material that Lanzmann and his team filmed for Shoah. Benzine got access to this footage through the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Nevertheless, Benzine doesn't want people to think his film is a mere "making-of," akin to a DVD special feature. The documentary also looks at other aspects of Lanzmann's life, including his fighting in the Resistance during World War II.

"It's about the making of Claude Lanzmann, or perhaps about the unmaking," Benzine says, "about how the process of doing this work led him to the place where he is now."

However, getting a giant of non-fiction cinema to sit down for an interview took a few tries before Lanzmann accepted.

"It was a difficult interview in places," Benzine says. "There were some things he didn't want to talk about, some things he was reluctant to talk about. Making [Shoah] really wore him out."

The Oscar-nominated film will also air on CBC's documentary channel on Jan. 27, as part of International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

As for receiving the nomination, Benzine calls the experience "surreal," adding that it is difficult for short films to receive any notice.

Meanwhile, he says he is especially delighted for his crew, many of whom deferred their salaries to get the film made.

"I'm not sure if I could have made this film if I were not in Canada," he says. "I found it easy and enjoyable to make friends and collaborators in [Toronto] – my cinematographer, my editor, my researcher, my sound recordist."

Benzine will compete against another Toronto resident in that category: director Sharmeen Obaid-Chinoy, nominated for A Girl in the River: The Price of Forgiveness.

Despite Lanzmann's stature as a director, he never received an Oscar nomination. Benzine says the academy's recognition this year could have been partly to make amends to a filmmaker they have ignored.

Although he isn't certain about whether Lanzmann will come to the Oscars, Benzine has reached out to the filmmaker and has high hopes.

"I'm sure there are a lot of people in Hollywood who want to shake his hand," Benzine says. ■

Correction

The Jan. 21 article "A celebration of Jewish music for Shabbat Shirah" incorrectly stated that Shabbat Shirah celebrations held in various congregations across Toronto were presented by Jewish Music Week. This is in fact not the case. The CJN regrets the error.

Home is Where the Heart is!

Four Aspects to Consider When Choosing a Retirement Home

Be nice to your kids, they choose your retirement home! While this may be the case, there is still a question of whether family members, often at a point of crisis or heightened stress, will choose wisely.

Nourishment for the body: Food in many cultures, including for the Jewish faith, plays a significant role in daily life. Whether it is bubbies' blintzes, brisket, apple pie or famous chicken soup, we all have fond memories of a particular dish. Beyond purely nutritional considerations, a good home should offer a variety of meal choices that evoke and stimulate those pleasant recollections of family gatherings.

Nourishment for the soul: Being spiritually satiated is just as, and perhaps in some aspects, even more important than being physically nourished. Particular attention should be paid to the overall atmosphere. Does the environment seem downcast and dreary? Or is there a sense of joy, excitement and positive energy rippling through the building?

You're never fully dressed without a smile: Pay close attention to facial expressions of both the residents and staff members. Make note of whether the people living and working at the home seem genuinely happy. Are there kind and smiling faces traversing the corridors? Or do the faces look sullen and tense? Smiles, like yawns, are contagious, and happy staff members will translate into happy residents and vice versa.

Rated R: How strict or numerous are the home's rules? While regulatory and safety standards are crucial, rules for the sake of rules are not. There should not be stipulations placed on visiting hours or frequency. Similarly there is 'dignity in risk'. Rules that are overly protective and undervalue the ability of the person to make even basic choices for oneself take away rather than foster independence and are quite frankly harmful in the long term. Your loved one has spent their lifetime making their own choices, there is no reason why they should be prevented from doing so going forward.

Mid-career artists need our support, too

Evelyn Tauben

Recently in The CJN, I wrote about the inherent ageism of otherwise superb Jewish incubator programs and intensive retreats that place a cap on participation at age 40. I advocated for shaping more intergenerational Jewish spaces and for not excluding mid-career artists or second-career entrepreneurs from communal support.

To expand the conversation, I interviewed four Jewish artists over the age of 40.

Boundless creative energy is in the blood of Philadelphia musician Susan Lankin-Watts. Her mother is the celebrated drummer Elaine Hoffman Watts, who at 83 regularly prods her daughter and The Fabulous Shpielkes band-mate: "How can we get that gig?" Forty-nine-year-old Lankin-Watts recently started a graduate program while launching Philly's Community Klezmer Initiative, getting out an all-ages crowd of 200 for a klezmer dance party. For her, the benefits of collaborating with both her octogenarian mother and emerging artists are keenly felt.

"There's a really nice energy that you can lose when you get older. What you don't have when you're 20 is rich years of skill, depth and wisdom about your art. But if you can combine both energies, then you're golden." Regarding her ongoing artistic projects, she said: "I feel more creative now than ever, but there's less of an accepting format for my creativity than 20 years ago."

Fifty-year-old dancer and performer Andrea Hodos from Los Angeles also feels she is thriving artistically. After having children, Hodos chose a more stable career in education, but, as she shared: "By the time I was ready to jump back into the arts when I was turning 40, I made a transition out of being a Jewish educator and no longer qualified for any of the institutional support that the Jewish community was giving." She asserted: "Don't discount my ability just because I spent a decade raising kids. I still have new ways of approaching my work and the impact my work can have on the community."

For musician and director of the Montreal Jewish Music Festival, Jason Rosenblatt, 42, being a parent is also a major factor in his career. Because his artistic work generates modest income, he teaches, leads choirs, and plays simchahs in addition to recording and touring with several projects, including his acclaimed group Shtreiml. Given his family commitments, he expressed: "I would rather see something from the Jewish community that is a grant submission process [as opposed to retreats] where the artist creates the program for himself."

> Don't discount my ability just because I spent a decade raising kids.
> Andrea Hodos

Aaron Lightstone, from Toronto's award-winning band Jaffa Road, is greatly informed by making music in intergenerational spaces. "As an artist in my 40s, I have a lot to learn from peers my age and older. And I've met musicians in their 20s who are amazing. I get a lot of inspiration, teaching and energy from them."

Hodos participated in NewGround, a Muslim-Jewish partnership program, after pushing for the removal of their age cap. Joining those young adults affirmed her belief in cross-generational work: "I have been finding as a Gen X person that I can help to build bridges between boomers and those younger. I think the world is always more interesting when you get people who are different next to each other. My hope is that more of these incubator programs for artists and innovators will open themselves so it will be more creative for everyone. There are people who got lost in the shuffle and we have a lot to offer."

Lankin-Watts speaks to ageless creative energy: "People often say to me it's time for the new generation to take over, it's time for my mother to step down; but I don't think its ever time for anyone to step down. If you're alive, you create. You create a heartbeat. You create a breath. As long as you're alive, you have something new to bring to each day." ■

Oboist performing at Temple Sinai eight months late

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Just before oboist Ron Cohen Mann was scheduled to perform at Temple Sinai last spring, he had a bicycle accident that left him with a broken jaw and fractured ear canals.

Completely recovered and playing better than ever, Cohen Mann, winner of the 2015 Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award, is looking forward to his rescheduled recital at the temple on Feb. 2.

Cohen Mann, who lives in New Haven, Conn., was riding his bike on the way to teach when a car ran him off the road, exactly a week before he was supposed to perform in Toronto last May. "I flew over the handlebars and landed on my chin," he said.

The question of whether he would be able to play the oboe as well as he had before the accident never entered his mind, he said. He added that he was encouraged by support he got from a friend, a percussionist in the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra, who had a bad bicycle accident and returned to performing.

For a month after the accident, Cohen Mann was unable to eat any solid food. "I was just craving a veggie burger and fries," he said. His recovery took another two months, and by last September, he was able to perform again.

Returning to the Yale School of Music in New Haven last September, where he's studying for an artists diploma, he found that several professors, unaware of his accident, remarked on how well he was playing.

Ron Cohen Mann

> When I started oboe, I took it pretty seriously.

"I had three, four professors say that they thought I improved a lot over the summer. That's when I quit playing for the most part. I played mostly in the last month before school."

Israeli-born, Cohen Mann, 24, lived in the Netherlands until he was 12, when he and his family moved to Vancouver. He picked up the oboe at age 14.

"When I started oboe, I took it pretty seriously," he said, adding that his first teacher was Roger Cole, the principal oboist for the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra. At the time, Cohen Mann didn't know where the oboe would lead him, but he said he did have dreams of becoming a professional oboist. He joined Vancouver's Youth Orchestra, which he said was his "first opportunity to play with talented colleagues who ended up studying at conservatories and universities."

Cohen Mann has performed with the Manhattan Symphonie, L'Orchestre de la Francophonie, the National Academy Orchestra of Canada and the Vancouver Metropolitan Orchestra, among others, and with the National Youth Orchestra of Canada at Carnegie Hall, Lincoln Center, Koerner Hall in Toronto, and Maison Symphonique in Montreal. Juilliard-trained pianist Benjamin Smith accompanies Cohen Mann at the Temple Sinai recital.

The program includes two fantasy pieces by Carl Nielsen and Hebrew Melody, Opus 33, by Russian composer Joseph Achron. "It's been recorded by every Jewish violinist ever. I'm looking forward to doing the oboe version I'm working on," Cohen Mann said.

Also on the program are Temporal Variations by Britten, the Oboe Concerto by Mozart and a concertina for oboe by Johann Wenzel Kalliwoda, an emotional, romantic work.

Upcoming for Cohen Mann is a recital on March 16 at the Unitarian Church of Vancouver, 949 West 49th Ave, Vancouver. He's touring the Baltic countries with the Yale Schola Cantorum from June 4 to 11. ■

For more information about Cohen Mann's Feb. 2 recital, free and open to the public, at 8 p.m. at Temple Sinai, visit www.templesinai.net. For more information about Cohen Mann, visit www.oboeron.com.

A sensitive look at a family coping with being different

DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In her professional life as a sociologist, Gail Benick wrote analytical accounts about migrants and diasporic people based on statistical and historical data. However, several years ago a story came to her that she had to tell differently.

Initially it surfaced as images and feelings. Then it started to evolve, fuelled by her deeply felt question, "How do people who have experienced horrific trauma clear the decks and have the wherewithal to get up the next morning and start over in a new country that they know nothing about?"

Benick's imagination and memories began to weave a tale. The story drew on aspects of her family history but was fictional, not a memoir.

Set in the 1950s and early 1960s in St. Louis, Mo., the narrative that ultimately developed into The Girl Who Was Born That Way focused on the Berk family. Mama, Papa and the two eldest daughters were survivors of the Lodz Ghetto. The two younger daughters were born in the United States.

Benick says she chose to divide the four sisters into two groups because she thought this structure advanced the story. The two older girls were people caught in transition, while the younger ones were full-fledged Americans. Nevertheless, all the sisters struggle with difference.

Benick asserts the Berks are nothing like her own family. Her relatives came to the United States well before World War II. They were not Holocaust survivors. She has one brother but no sisters. She grew up within a large, close-knit, extended family. She concedes that some of her cousins were almost like sisters to her. One cousin had Turner's syndrome, a chromosomal disorder that stunts growth and development, among other things. She also developed anorexia as a teenager.

Furthermore, Benick says, after her relatives read the pre-publication draft of her novella, they "vehemently told me that's not what it was like. That's your version. The Berks are not the Benicks."

She replied, "They're not meant to be."

Benick says her writing journey began with the emergence of characters. She describes the Berk family as closed off, protective and inhibited by shame. Mama and Papa are not sure if they will ever belong in this new culture, "especially because they have a daughter who does not fit." Mama, Papa and the two older girls refuse to talk about Lodz and how they miraculously managed to stay alive.

In response to the pain and uncertainty that permeates their home, each of the four girls constructs an identity that will transport her to more solid ground.

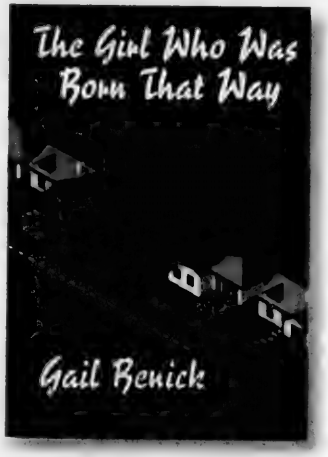
Hetty, the eldest seeks to be part of the Jewish establishment. She cares a great deal about fashion and looking good. Her fiancé, Lenny, is an orthodontist in training and is from a wealthy family.

Tilya, the second daughter is just the opposite. "She is a rebel and an intellectual. Her boyfriend, Robbie, is a crazy guy whose mother is a geneticist," Benick says.

"The Terry Sue character is what I remember of my cousin. It's my version and my memory of her."

Benick confesses that she identifies with Linda Sue, the youngest child. "She sprang to life carrying a camera and taking photos to try to save Terry Sue's life. She is curious, spunky and constantly seeking evidence. She's sensitive enough about what is happening to Terry Sue and to the family's emotional baggage to be able to tell the story."

Once the characters began to form, the story began to take shape, Benick says. "The actual writing of the novella took about a year, but switching from an academic approach to writing to writing fiction took about seven or eight years."



The Girl Who Was Born That Way
Gail Benick
Inana

Somewhere in the early 2000s, Benick taught a digital storytelling course at the University of Toronto, Mississauga campus. She worked with a technical instructor who taught the students how to turn their stories into movies.

"Honestly, the things these students, many of whom were immigrants, produced were overwhelming," Benick says. Realizing how powerful narrative can be motivated her to attempt fiction.

"I allowed myself to engage with the material in an emotional way. I took writing courses, formed a writers group and had a community of writers to work with.

"There must have been some readiness there for me to say, 'You're going to try something a little different. You're going to get out of your comfort zone. You're going to look at something that needs looking at.'

"And whenever I sat down to write, I seemed to write about grief. And then it came to me. Gail, of course you are writing about grief – you are grieving."

Benick describes the eating disorder her cousin developed as very much part of her family's experience. They watched her starve herself as they went from hospital to hospital and doctor to doctor. "There was no explanation for it. Anorexia in the late 1950s and early 1960s was just beginning to be understood."

The situation with Turner's syndrome was similar. Benick thinks her cousin's case was one of the earliest identified. "Doctors were interested in the condition but not demonstrating interest in the person in front of them. Her mom and dad were so overwhelmed they could not really hear what the medical people were saying to them. The rest of the family was never clear about what was going on.

"I wanted to give the character Terry Sue a voice because one thing I felt very strongly was that when she [Benick's cousin]was alive she didn't have a voice.

"That's partly why I wrote the book", Benick says. "The lack of communication on the part of the medical community, our not understanding. No way to rescue her. It was sorrowful."

Ultimately, in the 117 pages of The Girl Who Was Born That Way, Benick has compactly shown the complexities of migrating to a foreign land with few belongings and resources and many differences. She tells the story honestly, sensitively and with lots of heart. ■

ASK ELLA

Is it possible to be too sensitive?

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

Josh is in tune with my needs and really listens to me when I speak. He's the first guy I've dated in years who I feel connects to me emotionally and physically.

I feel petty even mentioning this problem, but here goes: he's a crier. He cries more than I do. I don't mean just in tragic situations. I mean he cries watching movies, TV shows or reading. Last week, we went to see Star Wars and there was a short before the movie in which a snowman was left alone in a refrigerator while the little girl who made him grew up and forgot about him. Oh my God did Josh sob!

What is that? Of all the men I've known in my life, I rarely saw any cry, and for sure not in public. I don't even know any women that cry as much as he does.

Do you think I can approach this subject with him, or should I just pretend not to notice and stop being so petty?

Crying Game

Dear Crying Game

Josh sounds like a very sensitive person. It's phenomenal to be able to find a match that fits with your needs this well.

This trait actually has a clinical name. Josh is a highly sensitive person or HSP. People like Josh feel things more deeply than most. He processes stimuli more acutely. He is likely more aware and in tune to all of his senses than the average person.

The question then becomes is this a problem? If it's not a problem for Josh, why is it a problem for you? Are you embarrassed? Do you feel less secure with a man who cries? On one hand, you are happy to have found a man who really hears and feels you, but on the other, you want him to check his sensitivity when it spills over into tears.

Society has conditioned us to perceive a crying man as weak, and we all know that "big boys don't cry" right? Wrong. Just recently we witnessed U.S. President Barack Obama cry while speaking about gun violence. Josh has broken the stereotype society has placed on genders and is not uncomfortable showing real emotion.

In a nutshell, this is not Josh's problem, it's yours. Instead of seeing his crying as a weakness, see it as a strength – the strength of a man not ashamed or embarrassed to show emotion.

Dear Ella,

This is the first year that our seven-year old Hannah has started to have sleepovers. She has a best friend, Hailey, who is a sweet, adorable little girl. The problem is when Hailey is here, things always escalate to tears. Hailey's tears. We have a busy house with three kids always running around. Our oldest boy is often playing hockey in the basement and yelling at the girls to get out. Hailey cries. If someone says something off, Hailey cries. This time we had a sleepover, and Hailey cried that she wanted to go home. This child is a little too much work for me right now, but I don't want to discourage Hannah from having her over. Any suggestions?

Little Drama Queen

Dear Little Drama Queen

Hailey is a highly sensitive child and therefore you need to handle her visits with extra TLC. I'm not sure how much you want to get involved, but I suggest you start by speaking to Hailey's parents about your observations and asking for tips to make Hailey and Hannah's visits filled with more fun and less drama.

Hailey becomes overwhelmed easily and, therefore, needs more structure to her visits. She probably doesn't like noise, screaming, fighting or surprises, which is why the basement isn't the best place for the girls when the boys are playing hockey there.

When Hailey comes over, try to structure the girls activities around quieter play, such as puzzles, crafts or a movie. Keep them away from the boys' rougher play. The girls are still young for sleepovers. Maybe stick to daytime play for now. If they are great friends, the little extra effort will be worth it. ■

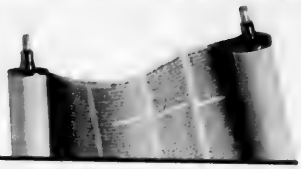
Parshah

Yitro | Exodus 18:1-20:23



Rabbi Ilan Acoca explains why swimming against the stream can sometimes be the right thing to do
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl on the connection between Shabbat and honouring our parents
Rabbi Catharine Clark considers the danger we face in coveting what does not belong to us

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

An obvious question raised about this week's Parshah is why was it named after Yitro? Why would he get an honour that even Moses didn't get?

I think Yitro had something that was unique: he was seeking truth. Yitro went through many phases in his life looking for the creator of the world until he finally heard the miracles that occurred with Israel. He then realized that he'd finally gotten to the truth and converted to Judaism. That's why this Torah section is named after Yitro – to teach us this lesson.

The question is, what happened to the rest of the world? They also heard the miracles of what happened to the Jewish nation. Why did they not convert? One answer is that even though they heard about the miracles, as Yitro did, they didn't internalize the message. It takes a lot of willpower to change your lifestyle, even though you know it's the right thing to do. Yitro had the conviction, that the rest of the world did not, and even though he was swimming against the stream, he knew he was right.

I have written extensively on several occasions about Sephardi Judaism, about my concerns, visions and goals. At times, I question what the future of Sephardi Jewry will be in the 21st century and whether it will survive. When I think about that, there's a saying in Ethics of our Fathers (2:21) that crosses my mind: "You are not obligated to complete the work, but neither are you free to desist from it."

I am blessed to have among my Sephardi peers a supportive group that works cohesively to ensure a promising future for the next generation, and even though we're sometimes going against the stream, each of us knows it's the right thing to do.

May God give us the strength, wisdom and insights to carry on. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

In three different legal sections of the Torah, the commandments to honour and revere parents are juxtaposed with the mitzvah to guard and remember Shabbat.

In the Ten Declarations of God in Exodus, we read: "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy… Honour your father and your mother." In the rephrasing by Moses in Deuteronomy, we are instructed: "Guard the Sabbath day, to keep it holy… Honour your father and your mother." And in the Holiness code of Leviticus, the two commandments are placed within the same verse: "A person shall revere one's mother and father; and you shall guard my Shabbatot."

What links these mitzvot? Our talmudic sages indicate that even though one must honour and revere parents, this obligation does not extend to violating biblical law, for Shabbat or other mitzvot. Many commentators suggest the connection is theological: each refers to the sacred nature of creation. Shabbat marks the creation of the world, and parents are their children's source of life.

Rabbi Shai Held of New York cites the Protestant scholar Walter Brueggemann, who suggests that the commandment to honour parents reflects a concern for elders who have "lost their productive capacity and social utility and are made vulnerable." The association to the mitzvah of Shabbat affirms "life beyond and outside productivity."

In Canada, as we consider physician-assisted dying, our society should recall the cry, "Do not cast me off in old age; when my strength fails, do not forsake me!" A midrash portrays King David saying, "In my youth, I would go into battle for Your children. Now that I am weak, they ask, 'How long will the old man continue to live?'" Rabbi Held concludes: "To take the fifth commandment to heart is to understand that no one should ever be made to feel that we as a society are simply waiting for them to die." ■

Rabbi Catharine Clark

In the 10th commandment as presented in Parshat Yitro, God instructs us not to covet our neighbour's house. You might consider this demand unreasonable. Surely God has seen the Goldsteins' new place! Who would not covet it? Any serious cook would love those marble countertops, and that hockey rink in the backyard is every true Canadian's dream.

Hebrew philology seems to support your objection. The verb prohibiting coveting, tachmod, also occurs in Exodus 34:24. There, the Lord exhorts the Israelites to travel to Jerusalem three times a year for the festivals. Part of God's encouragement includes the promise that the faithful pilgrims' land will still be theirs when they return home. No one will seize, yachmod, the land in their absence. In this passage, the same verb refers to an action, not an emotion. Go ahead and envy the Goldsteins, just do not invade their home.

However, the restatement of the Ten Commandments in Parshat Va'etchanan (in Deuteronomy) closes this loophole. There we are commanded not to crave our neighbour's house. The verb used in this version, titavveh, is also found in a story from Numbers. The Lord supplies manna for the nutritional needs of the wandering Israelites, but some riffraff feel a gluttonous craving not satisfied by manna. God's anger is aroused at their craving, and the Lord sends quail and a plague to destroy them. Indeed, it is best not to think longingly of the Goldstein's kitchen and backyard.

The small difference between the two versions of the 10th commandment teaches that there is danger not just in acting unlawfully to take what is not ours, but also in wanting what is not ours. It is difficult not to covet, but we are obligated to try to meet the challenge. ■

Steaming bowl of soup for a cold day

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Soup is one of those things that people naturally turn to once winter hits. It's comforting, filling and best of all, can be made in less time than you might think. Soup is a welcome repast on a frigid night and can usually be made in less than a half an hour (provided that you have already roasted the vegetables for the roasted vegetable soup).

Roasted vegetable soup

This thick soup is a meal in a bowl. It's hearty and delicious and you really only need some good crusty bread to round out your meal. The beautiful thing is that you can make the vegetables up to 2 days ahead and change them up as you see fit.

- ❑ 1 lb. carrots, peeled and cut into chunks
- ❑ 1 sweet potato, peeled and cut into chunks
- ❑ 4 cups broccoli florets
- ❑ 1/3 cup fruity olive oil
- ❑ ½ tsp. salt
- ❑ ¼ tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1 onion, chopped
- ❑ 2 large cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 6 cups (approx.) chicken or vegetable stock

Preheat the oven to 400. Toss together the carrot and sweet potato chunks and the broccoli florets in a large bowl along with 5 tbsp. of the oil, salt and pepper, until the vegetables are well coated. Spread on an aluminum-foil lined large baking sheet. Spread the vegetables as much as possible to make sure they are in a single layer.

Roast in the centre of the preheated oven, stirring once, until all of the vegetables are very soft, 35 to 40 minutes. (The vegetables can be cooled down and refrigerated for up to 2 days).

Heat the remaining oil in a Dutch oven or a large saucepan set over medium heat. Add the onion and garlic. Cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Add all of the roasted vegetables, stirring until well coated with the onion mixture. Pour in the broth. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, uncovered, for 10 minutes to allow the flavours to meld. Using an immersion blender or a regular blender, puree the soup, adding up to 1 cup more broth if the mixture becomes too thick. Serve hot. Makes 6 servings.

Squash soup with star anise

The smashed garlic and ginger root perfume this soup along with the star anise. They don't break apart during the cooking so it's easy to fish them out of the broth before you purée the soup. If you prefer a stronger garlic flavour, simply mince both the garlic and the ginger root and only remove the whole anise before you purée the soup in a blender.

- ❑ 1 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 8 green onions, chopped
- ❑ 2 large cloves garlic, smashed
- ❑ 1 piece peeled fresh ginger root, about 1-1/2 in. large
- ❑ 3 whole star anise
- ❑ ¾ tsp. salt
- ❑ ❑ ½ tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1 butternut squash, peeled, seeded and cut into 1-in. chunks (about 8 cups)
- ❑ 4 cups (approx) chicken or vegetable stock

Heat the oil in a Dutch oven or a large saucepan set over medium heat. Keeping aside two tbsp., add the green onions. Cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Stir in the garlic, ginger root, star anise, salt and pepper, stirring until well coated with the green onion. Stir in the butternut squash. Pour in the chicken stock. Bring the mixture to a boil. Reduce the heat and simmer, covered, until the squash is very tender. Remove the garlic, ginger root and star anise. In a regular blender or using an immersion blender, purée the soup, adding up to 1 cup more stock if the soup is too thick . Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Serve garnished with the reserved green onion. Makes 6 servings. ■

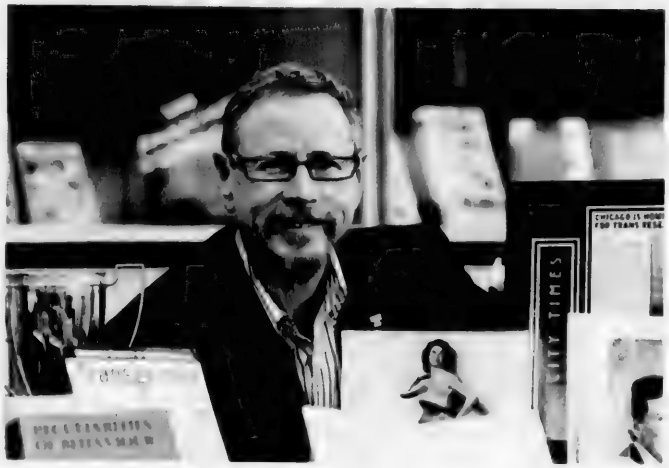
Aaron Devor: Blazing a path for trans people

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Recently appointed the inaugural research chair in transgender studies at the University of Victoria, Prof. Aaron Devor, has been studying and teaching about transgender topics for more than 30 years. He is the author of Gender Blending: Confronting the Limits of Duality (1989), FTM: Female-To-Male Transsexuals in Society (1997, 2016), and The Transgender Archives: Foundations for the Future (2014). He is also founder and academic director of the world's largest transgender archives at the University of Victoria.

An American Jewish billionaire philanthropist in Chicago has pledged $1 million (US) to establish Devor's new position, which is believed to be the first chair of transgender studies at a major university. The foundation has also pledged to donate up to $1 million more to match gifts from other sources. Jennifer Pritzker, a retired U.S. Army lieutenant colonel who is believed to be the only transgender billionaire in the world, made the gift through her Tawani Foundation to the University of Victoria.



Prof. Aaron Devor

What is your background?
I was born in the Bronx but have lived in Canada since 1969. I became a faculty member at UVic in 1989, and UVic was my first tenure-track job.

When did you begin getting involved in transgender studies, and what was the impetus for you to do so?
I have always been interested in gender variance and people who challenge conventional gender norms and stereotypes. I started my master's thesis in the early 1980s studying women who identified as women, but who strangers often mistakenly thought were men. That turned into my first book Gender Blending: Confronting the Limits of Duality. At that time, there was no such thing as transgender studies, and only a handful of people even used the word transgender. That book is seen by many as one of the classics of transgender studies.

Why is it important that UVic have a chair in transgender studies?
One in 200 people is transgender or gender non-conforming. While in the past year or so we have seen unprecedented positive attention to trans people in the popular media, social change is uneven, and despite glamorous celebrity coming-out stories, far too many trans and gender non-conforming people still live in poverty and fear.

Good research forms a solid foundation for better laws and policies, and for changing hearts and minds. The chair in transgender studies will assist in both the creation and transfer of reliable knowledge about and for trans and gender non-conforming people. The chair will also act as a resource locally and internationally for those needing information for their own research, media reports, policy development, or for use in classrooms.

What should the Jewish community know about the relevance of transgender studies?
The Jewish community should be aware that there are many trans and gender-non-conforming Jews – one in 200. Reform Judaism just passed new policy welcoming trans people, and Conservative Judaism's law committee will be considering updating their policies shortly. I advised on the development of the current policy, which was adopted in 2003.

Why did the Tawani Foundation donate this money to UVic specifically?
In her remarks at the announcement of the chair, Jennifer Pritzker said that the issue of human gender identity is something all humans deal with every day of their lives and that there should be at least one institution of higher learning that addresses this on a high level of scholastic and scientific research.

She noted that UVic has made itself a leader on this topic, with first-class archives that are the largest and most comprehensive in the world, as well as leading scholars in the field. She said her support is an investment in success, and it's her personal goal that this chair in transgender studies will stimulate outstanding work at other institutions and create a global network for the study of this topic.

> Good research forms a solid foundation for better laws and policies, and for changing hearts and minds.

What will be the first things you do as new chair?
My main research focus over the past few years has been on building the Transgender Archives and historical research on trans activism. That work will continue, but I will now begin to establish further collaborations with researchers in other disciplines. I plan to build local, national and international linkages with others working in transgender studies, foster research and scholarship in transgender studies, host visiting academic and community scholars, mentor students and junior colleagues, do community outreach and knowledge mobilization, teach in the area of transgender studies and do development work in support of the chair in transgender studies at UVic.

How long will $1 million sustain this chair?
The university has approved the chair for a standard five-year term. We will review and consider a renewal after that time.

Where else is transgender studies being studied?
Transgender topics are being studied at most universities around the world. For example, I had an email this week from a junior researcher working on a transgender topic at a university in Islamabad. The University of Arizona is working on developing a graduate certificate program in transgender studies and hopes to expand it into a degree program in the coming years.

Regarding the Transgender Archives at UVic, how was all this material collected? What is its significance?
The materials were donated by individuals who had collected them because they understood their historical significance. They are the raw materials from which history is written.

In my book The Transgender Archives: Foundations for the Future, which is downloadable as a free PDF file, I noted that as the largest collection of transgender archival materials in the world, the archives are a unique and invaluably rich resource from which to learn about the complexity of human gender variation. Our collections bear witness to the courage, vision, and perseverance of our elders and forebears. They had the wisdom to see that there was much important work to be done to make the world a more just place for all. Each in their own ways took on a piece to the job of making the world safer and more hospitable for people who do not easily fit within prevailing simplistic binary and hierarchical systems and structures of gender. They all took risks in doing this. Some suffered significantly for their boldness. All contributed to advancing gender freedoms. We owe them more than we can know.

The archives stand as a testament to those brave souls who risked so much to forge a pathway for today's advances. By keeping their names alive, and by preserving the records of the work they have done, we can repay some of our debt to our pioneers. Thus, those who have had the foresight to do the work of collecting and preserving, also do the work of advancing social justice. All people need to know their history, and this is even more so for people who have been so abject that through much of our history, our very survival has depended on our ability to keep our gender variance hidden.

We welcome community members, scholars and independent researchers, activists and allies to come to the archives to explore our diverse collections and through them to learn about who we are, and how we got to where we are today. The archives are open to the public, free of charge. They safeguard a broad spectrum of trans heritage, so that the work our pioneers have done will not be forgotten. ■

Trump, Ford and 'The International Jew'

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Donald Trump's surprising success thus far in the Republican presidential nomination race is based in part on his bullying bravado and his loud rebuke of the political establishment, and partly on the power of fear. In Trump's campaign, it is about the fear of illegal immigrants overwhelming the United States and Muslims, who whether they were born in the United States or not, are collectively portrayed as potential Islamic State recruits and terrorists.

Such targeted scapegoating, which uses propaganda and the exaggeration of tragic events to smear millions of people who also happen to be Muslim, is an old political trick that dates back to ancient Rome and attacks on Christians. Jewish history, too, is rife with such examples, from medieval Spain to Nazi Germany, but also nearly a century ago in the United States when the spectre of the "International Jew" was conceived by American nationalists, Trump-like supporters of the nativist and racist 100 Per Cent Americanism movement.

As in Canada, anti-Semitism that excluded American Jews from a range of professions and jobs, universities, social clubs and resorts was common from the 1880s well into the 20th century. During and after World War I, as the fear of left wing radicalism spread, all Jews were seen to be Russian revolutionaries, Bolsheviks who put the American way of life in peril. These attitudes were given more credence during the Red Scare hysteria of 1919.

The Red Scare coincided with the dissemination of The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion. An alleged blueprint for a Jewish conspiracy to rule the world, the tract with its 24 "protocols" was published in Russia in 1903 and 1905. It was, as the London Times later showed, "a clumsy plagiarism," stolen from a variety of French and German sources which had nothing to do with Jews. Nevertheless, after the 1917 revolution, it was translated in many languages and widely distributed by a group of pro-Czarist immigrants, and is still referenced today by hate groups on the Internet.

In the United States, the Protocols were championed by automobile innovator and pioneer Henry Ford, an "American First" supporter. Influenced by Social Darwinism and eugenics, Ford had long believed that Jews, especially those who were bankers and moneylenders, were the curse of civilization, who "encouraged the breakdown of the family, of morality, of order." Starting in May 1920, Ford's journal, The Dearborn Independent, ran a series of 91 articles on "The International Jew: The World's Problem," based on the nonsense in the Protocols.

The Independent had a weekly circulation of a million readers and every customer who purchased a Model-T Ford also purchased a subscription. After the series was concluded, it was reissued as a pamphlet entitled, The International Jew and reached millions more across the United States, Canada and Europe. It was particularly popular in Germany, where the Nazis, still a fringe party in the early '20s, distributed many copies. Adolf Hitler regarded Ford as "great man."

American Jewish groups condemned Ford, who really never understood what all the fuss was about. He truly believed that international Jewish financiers were behind World War I and were plotting to take over the global economy. In the spring of 1924, the Independent ran a new series about "Jewish exploitation of Farmers' Organizations" that slandered Aaron Sapiro, a Jewish lawyer who was involved in organizing farm co-operatives in Canada and the United States. He filed a libel suit against the Independent, which after several years Ford agreed to settle with a public apology.

In 1923, Ford was touted as a possible presidential candidate. His anti-Semitism, paternal attitude toward assembly-line factory workers, moralizing about the evils of liquor and tobacco and the fiasco of the trip he financed to Europe aboard his "Peace Ship" in 1915 to try to stop the war did not initially count against him. "To millions," as historian John Higham wrote, "he embodied the old pioneer virtues: a farm-bred simplicity contemptuous of elegance or intellect, a rugged individualism, a genius for practical achievement."

But unlike Trump, he did not have the requisite "big" personality for the political arena, stage presence and ability to fend off his critics with insults. ■

Anne Frank's stepsister rips Trump, and Abe Vigoda finally confirms rumours

Sitcom actor dies – for real this time

Abe Vigoda, a Jewish actor best known for playing a cranky detective in the 1970s sitcom Barney Miller, died Jan. 26 in Woodland Park, N.J. He was 94. People magazine mistakenly reported that the sunken-eyed Vigoda had died in 1982, which became a running joke in Hollywood and beyond for more than 30 years. In addition to his role as Sgt. Phil Fish on Barney Miller, the Brooklyn, N.Y.-born Vigoda is best known for playing turncoat mobster Salvatore Tessio in 1972's The Godfather. He also starred in a shortlived Barney Miller spinoff sitcom called Fish.

Sgt. Fish is sleeping with the fishes.

Republican hopeful likened to Hitler

The stepsister of Holocaust teen diarist Anne Frank compared U.S. Republican presidential front-runner Donald Trump to Hitler. In a Newsweek essay published on International Holocaust Remembrance Day, Eva Schloss, 86, said Canada and the United States should accept more Syrian refugees and compared their experience to that of Jews in the Shoah. She also said "it would be a complete disaster" if Trump became president, adding, "I think he is acting like another Hitler by inciting racism." Schloss' mother married Otto Frank, Anne Frank's father, after World War II. The families were friends in Amsterdam and the two girls played together before the Franks went into hiding. Schloss, who survived Auschwitz, was 11 years old when her family left Nazi-annexed Austria in 1938 for Belgium.

Rapper goes flat out for Irving

In his new single, Grammy-nominated rap star B.o.B. offers support for Holocaust denier David Irving, along with reiterating a Tweet that said the earth is flat. The track, released Jan. 25 in response to a Twitter argument with astrophysicist Neil deGrasse Tyson about the shape of the earth, focuses primarily on the rapper's conviction that the earth isn't round, but in the second verse, B.o.B., whose real name is Bobby Ray Simmons Jr., urges listeners to "Do your research on David Irving." "Stalin was way worse than Hitler," the song continues. "That's why the POTUS gotta wear a kippah," he adds, presumably referring to U.S. President Barack Obama. ■

Letters to the Editor

Don't write off the Liberals

In his column, ("Why Jews will continue to support the Tories," Jan. 21) Michael Taube predicts that Jewish voters in Canada will continue to mark their ballots overwhelmingly in favour of the Conservatives.

It is probably too early to make such a prediction. The party is getting a new leader in 2017 and it is possible that he or she will rub the Jewish community the wrong way. Beyond that, the next federal election in Canada is not until 2019. That is a lot of time for Jewish voters to evaluate how the Liberals handle the economic situation in Canada and to see what they do in foreign affairs.

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has already shown himself to be loyal to Israel and the fight against anti-Semitism. The new government has voted against anti-Israel motions at the United Nations and the prime minister himself, a man who despises racism in all forms, has spoken out against the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement and other forms of hatred against Jews. That, coupled with pictures of Trudeau wearing a kippah, lighting Chanukah candles and getting along with his counterpart in Israel, may just shift some of the Jewish vote back to the Liberals.

The Shoah was different

I am a 95-year-old Holocaust survivor, and I would like to comment on an article written by Bernie Farber, "The genocides are different but the pain is the same," (Jan. 21).

I wonder how Farber can compare the harsh treatment of the children in northern Canada to the systematic killing of Jewish children by the barbaric German soldiers. One-and-a half million Jewish children were killed just because they were Jewish. You probably have seen the image of a child with his hands in the air and a German soldier pointing a gun at him. Is this harsh treatment? This child likely didn't survive.

I believe Farber should have refreshed his memory on the history of the Holocaust before comparing the genocide of the indigenous, Armenian, Rwandan, or other peoples to the Jewish tragedy of World War II. The pain is not the same.

You should amend your article after you brush up on your history.

The politics of kashrut

I hated reading this headline: "Does marijuana need a hechsher" (Jan. 21) and then this line in the article: "Any product which is ingested... must bear kosher certification, council executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel told The CJN."

Nothing "needs" a hechsher. A hechsher symbol just assures a nervous public that the food was made in accordance with halachic law.

If it wasn't supervised, but made the same way, would it still be kosher? This question is rhetorical. The answer is yes.

But wait! If we don't need kosher certification on this, maybe we won't need the guy who said that everything that is ingested must bear kosher certification? And then he might be out of a job! Sacre bleu! This is a slippery slope indeed.

Only a Jewish newspaper would ask the guy who does the job whether we need his job, and then when he says yes, we say, "Well I guess that's that."

RABBI-2-RABBI

How will you use your extra month?

This Jewish leap year, let's make Adar I a time of Jewish growth centred on learning, spirituality, tzedakah and joy

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LAB, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: The month of February has 29 days once every four years, when, as is the case in 2016, we have a leap year in the Gregorian calendar. But gaining a single day pales in comparison to a leap year in the Jewish calendar, like this year, where we gain an entire month. One week from now, we will mark the beginning of Adar I. Who said there is no benefit to being Jewish?

Other than yahrzeit observances and holidays following later than usual on the Gregorian calendar (including the unusual juxtaposition of the last night of Chanukah and New Year's Eve 2017), the additional month in the Jewish calendar has limited impact on our everyday lives, since our schedules and routines are so much more tied to February than to Adar.

How do we make more of this gift of a month added to our current Jewish year? With time so precious, and often seemingly so scarce, should we not be celebrating the fact that 5776 gives us 29 extra days to add Jewish meaning to our lives?

What will we do with the extra time? Sure, we can binge-watch five seasons of The Good Wife, but can't we find some meaningful ways to strengthen our Jewish lives?

Rabbi Finegold: Well, for starters we could publicize the fact that we get two Purims. We could easily get a boost in communal participation if we chose to celebrate that holiday twice.

In all seriousness though, the Talmud mentions that when farmers were not in their busy season, the yeshivot would hold study months, referred to as yarchei kallah, literally the easy months.

But while many movements have designated times to study, and many have even chosen to do it at times when people are typically on vacation (the Limmud movement, which started in the United Kingdom, meets during the last week of the secular year), our extra month falls right when many people are so busy at work or with the inevitable weather delays that our northern environment provides.

What if we used Adar II as an opportunity to integrate some facet of Jewish life into our day-to-day activity. Imagine if we promoted Adar II as a make-it-to-minyan month, or a sign-up-for-a-Jewish-class month?

In fact I would like to lead by example: anyone who reads this and signs up for my Jewish Learning Lab adult education classes in Montreal during Adar II can bring a friend for free!

Rabbi Scheim: One of my most memorable teachers in my university years was the late Prof. Yonah Frankel of Hebrew University. A renowned scholar of midrash and aggadah, Prof. Frankel was also a confirmed yekke, making every second count. Heaven help the student who would show up one minute late to his class. Prof. Frankel refused to relinquish even a millisecond of usable time.

Every minute offers mitzvah opportunities. This year's benefit of an additional month in the Jewish calendar, as you suggest, can spur us to add to our learning, and spirituality. It can also lead us to explore opportunities to volunteer, to engage in tzedakah work, to plan that put-off trip to Israel.

I am with you in suggesting the marketing of the added month of Adar to the benefit of our Jewish growth. Maybe that's what the sages intended when they taught, "when Adar comes, we increase our joy."

Rabbi Finegold: You know what happens when a yekke marries a Chassid? You have a wedding that starts exactly two hours late.

Let us not forget to add the joy in our lives this month as well. Indeed, if we ignore the dialectic between the driven, focused part of ourselves and the joyful "chassidic" parts of ourselves, we can miss out on much that Judaism has to offer.

Our proposed month of increased Jewish growth should certainly be one where the yekke marries the Chassid. I know for me what that ends up looking like is ensuring that I am quite meticulous about bringing joy into my life. I am sure that we all have our particular ways of expressing the merger of the exacting and the messy, yet fun parts of our nature. I hope we use the extra Adar to express them fully. ■

The mural and the damage done

Last week, cjnews.com was first to report Toronto businessman Paul Bronfman's decision to pull funding from York University over a painting entitled Palestinian Roots, which hangs in the school's student centre. In this week's CJN, we take a closer look at the debate surrounding the controversial painting.

Frequent CJN contributor Michael Diamond argues that Palestinian Roots acts as a "negative symbol" for York's Jewish students. "Its presence," he writes, "reflects the negative experience of many Jewish students at York... who are aggrieved by what appears to be a callous disregard for their feelings and emotional welfare." The painting's impact, he notes, might have been muted were the situation on campus more positive for York's Jewish and pro-Israel students. Instead, "for the many Jews on campus who identify strongly with Israel, [the painting] is a warning of public denunciation, verbal attacks or worse to come from fellow students, graduate students and professors."

Lorne Sossin, dean of York's Osgoode Hall Law School, sees room for more nuance when it comes to Palestinian Roots. "Some saw it as an incitement to violence, as it appears not just to depict a Palestinian about to throw a rock at an Israeli outpost but to glorify doing so," he writes. "Others I spoke with saw it as an expression of the self-destructive impulse of a young person about to engage in senseless violence. Still others saw it as an unfair and damaging portrayal of Palestinians as rock-throwers rather than a community defined by its culture, shared hopes and values."

Diamond wouldn't disagree that the meaning of art lies in the eye of the beholder, nor that freedom of expression is an essential characteristic of the university experience. But he contends that "free speech does not actually exist at York," where "one's freedom to express a point of view is judged more or less acceptable depending on the point of view expressed." "To support the Palestinian Roots mural on the basis of free speech is unacceptable," he adds, "because free speech, in its true sense, is absent at York University."

For its part, the university claims its hands are tied, since the student centre is "a separate and distinct legal entity." "The students who run the [student] centre," Sossin explains, "have the right to decide what art is put on its walls." (For his part, Bronfman dismissed that argument. "It's a bunch of political, bureaucratic rhetoric," he told The CJN.)

And yet, ultimately, Diamond and Sossin agree that Palestinian Roots should be taken down, albeit for different reasons. For Diamond, "the mural is offensive and uncomfortable to anyone who is aware of its symbols," while Sossin's reasoning is more technical: "[S]ince the contest under which the mural was displayed specified a specific two-year term which has now passed, to continue to display the mural at this point... appears to reflect a specific intention to see some York students as unwelcome in their own centre."

For now, though, Palestinian Roots continues to hang in York's student centre, a stark reminder of the rising temperature on campus. The question is whether all sides can come to some sort of understanding before this situation gets even worse. ■ — YONI

AN OPEN LETTER

Rekindling the light of Jewish social justice

We are a group of authors, artists, human rights advocates, scholars, rabbis, Jewish communal professionals and others who are concerned by the growing scarcity of Jewish-led social justice in Canada. We call for a renewed social justice effort to shine a Jewish light on issues of power and vulnerability in Canada.

Taking inspiration from Jewish values, Jews have, historically, been active at the forefront of every social justice movement in North America. Jewish social activists have a great legacy of addressing issues of justice, human rights, equity and dignity for all human beings. From being a strong voice on poverty, to supporting organized labour, to in engaging in interfaith and inter-ethnic dialogue, the Canadian Jewish community was long a model for others. And the community's ongoing fight against anti-Semitism was never simply about protecting Jews from prejudice, but also about fostering a culture of human rights and dignity for all Canadians.

Yet, with the important exception of the concerted move by many synagogue congregants across the country to open their hearts to Syrian refugees, we have found that issues around poverty, racism and dignity for the country's most vulnerable – as well as for suffering populations around the globe – have taken a back seat in the organized Jewish community to the much narrower agenda of Israel advocacy.

We seek to build on the Jewish legacy of social justice commitments by suggesting the creation of a coalition similar to the U.S.-based Jewish Social Justice Roundtable, which captures 52 organizations under a Jewish umbrella. Such an endeavour would elevate, expand and enhance the work of national Jewish movements and rabbinic groups in Canada as well as the array of organizations currently working in areas of refugees, immigration and resettlement, domestic abuse, poverty, hunger, addiction, and employment. It would also bring together individuals unattached to specific organizations who nevertheless bring a range of similar values and expertise.

At present, most of the existing Jewish community organizations involved in helping the vulnerable are direct service agencies. A new and enhanced Canadian Jewish coalition would not only seek to forge linkages across them, but would enable the community to identify strategies to address deeper structural social ills. In partnership with other communities, such a coalition would be well placed to suggest new responses to systemic forms of oppression in Canada and beyond.

For many Canadian Jews, Jewish activism and repair of our world, popularly known as tikkun olam, are central to their Jewish identity. Yet they currently lack substantive outlets in the Jewish community for deep engagement. For all of us, Canadian democratic values along with Jewish values call us to respond to systems that continue to marginalize, disempower and cause harm. Moreover, the level of resources, organizational finesse and social capital that our community possesses, and our acute historical experience of being a collective outsider, makes us well placed to live and model a collective politics of compassion in the service of economic and social justice.

How do we, as Canadian Jews, engage in the great issues facing our country? How can our advocacy organizations become directly accountable to the values held by the public they seek to lead? And does Judaism call on us to care only for our own, or to create a world rooted in justice and dignity for all inhabitants? These and many other questions need answers, and we hereby initiate the conversation. In the darkness of winter, let us strive to relight the candle of Jewish participation in our tradition of tikkun olam. ■

The limits of free expression at York U

Universities cannot thrive when some students feel unwelcome, marginalized

LORNE SOSSIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

My views on the controversy surrounding the Palestinian Roots mural in the York University Student Centre are clear and simple. First, I believe the art has offended many York community members – both inside and outside the Jewish community – and these very real concerns have not been adequately addressed by the leadership of the student centre. The centre is a gathering place for all York students – not just for some, or those who subscribe to a particular view of Middle East politics.

Second, the students who run the centre have the right to decide what art is put on its walls, subject to legal limits (whether it be the Human Rights Code, Criminal Code, or York's own Code of Students Rights and Responsibilities).

Third, universities ought not become places of academic boycotts, attempts to silence debate or efforts to shout down those who disagree or make any community members unsafe.

The issue of artwork in York's student centre appears to pit support for the Jewish community and Jewish students at York against support for freedom of expression. This characterization of the issue is inaccurate and unhelpful. Support for the Jewish community and Jewish students at York, in my view, requires support for freedom of expression, and vice versa.

Throughout history, Jewish culture and community have thrived in settings with robust and effectively protected freedom of expression. By the same token, anti-Semitism flourishes where, and to the extent that, expressive freedom is curtailed. Jewish law and thought have been shaped over centuries by debate, discussion and dissent, not by disengagement or doctrinaire truths developed by some and imposed on all.

For many Jews on campus, the mural is a warning of denunciation, attacks

MICHAEL DIAMOND
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Paul Bronfman took a strong position when he announced he would withdraw his company's significant financial support from York University unless a mural titled Palestinian Roots hanging in the school's student centre was removed. For this, we should be thankful. He has taken a public stand on behalf of the Jewish students of York, and our community at large.

The mural is offensive and uncomfortable to anyone who is aware of its symbols. Palestinian colours, a map of all of Israel, a man holding rocks and looking out over a bulldozer that is about to remove an olive tree – these are reflective of an anti-Israel narrative. They suggest that Israel is the aggressor, deserving of condemnation and, possibly, violence. In the context of the current rash of knife and vehicle attacks in Israel, including the recent deaths of a mother of six and a young woman, the image is that much more offensive.

And yet the reason that the continued existence of the mural in the student centre is important has little to do with the impact of its message on the general student body. That impact is limited to the relative few on campus who notice the mural and recognize its symbols. Rather, its presence reflects the negative experience of many Jewish students at York who do see and understand it, and who are aggrieved by what appears to be a callous disregard for their feelings and emotional welfare. The mural is a negative symbol for Jewish students.

No, the mural is not the major issue confronting Jewish students at York, or, indeed, most universities today. In truth, if the environment on campus were otherwise positive and if Israel was not the perennial whipping boy of the ideological left, which finds a willing host in the so-called progressive halls of today's universities, the mural might not matter. But instead, Palestinian Roots acts as a stark reminder that there are many at York who have very strong and very negative, opinions about Israel and Israelis. And for the many Jews on campus who identify strongly with Israel, it is a warning of public denunciation, verbal attacks or worse to come from fellow students, graduate students and professors.

The argument in favour of the mural's continued display is based on the principle of free speech.

Art can provoke uncomfortable thought and discussion

What I find most remarkable about those who have purported to convey the "truth" of what is going on at York in relation to the student centre artwork is the conviction they demonstrate that they have nothing at all to learn from others, especially those who disagree with them. Nothing, in my view, could stray further from Jewish traditions or what makes Toronto's – and Canada's – Jewish community so vibrant and strong, and what makes me so proud to be a part of these communities.

People who think they have nothing left to learn, who demonstrate no humility or interest in why other thoughtful and engaged people disagree with them, are precisely the people who are most unsettled by universities. Universities are premised on the proposition that we all have something to learn, new perspectives to consider and old perspectives to reconsider, and that the best way to do this is in an inclusive atmosphere of respect for others and open and free debate, whether reflected in a class, lecture, article or piece of art.

Before the issue became of interest to the media, when it was primarily of interest only to community members, I heard a range of views about the art itself. Some saw it as an incitement to violence, as it appears not just to depict a Palestinian about to throw a rock at an Israeli outpost but to glorify doing so. Others I spoke with saw it as an expression of the self-destructive impulse of a young person about to engage in senseless violence. Still others saw it as an unfair and damaging portrayal of Palestinians as rock-throwers rather than a community defined by its culture, shared hopes and values.

Which perspective is "true"? The answer is easy. They all are – and there are many other interpretations of the art I no doubt haven't yet heard. Art is often created for the purpose of provoking thought and discussion – even uncomfortable thought and discussion.

While all this explains my support for the right of the York student centre to display the art in question, I should also explain why I believe the art should not continue to be displayed.

First, since the contest under which the mural was displayed specified a specific two-year term which has now passed, to continue to display the mural at this point, after the leadership of the student centre have become clearly aware that some York students find the art offensive and hurtful, appears to reflect a specific intention to see some York students as unwelcome in their own centre. Whether or not intended, that is how reasonable community members would likely view it, and this perception is corrosive to the values of inclusion and community that ought to animate the student centre.

Lorne Sossin

While a university cannot thrive where free and open expression is undermined, similarly, it cannot thrive where members of the university community feel unwelcome and marginalized. Navigating between these shoals is challenging work – and it is exactly the challenge universities were created to do.

If we can successfully resist those who would prefer to see complex reality as black/white, love/hate, pro/anti, I have no doubt we will come out of these kinds of discussions with a stronger and more inclusive university, and a stronger and more inclusive Jewish community. ■

Lorne Sossin is dean and professor at Osgoode Hall Law School, and presidential adviser on community engagement at York University.

For pro-Israel students at York, free speech doesn't exist

Whatever the message it imparts, so the theory goes, it is art, and as such depicts a point of view, whose reception will vary based on the viewer. Since universities are supposed to be bastions of free speech, the mural is judged a reasonable expression of a point of view.

Fine, except that free speech does not actually exist at York. In fact, at York, and many other campuses, one's freedom to express a point of view is judged more or less acceptable depending on the point of view expressed. That is why pro-Israel – not to mention plain, old Jewish – events are routinely crashed by protesters. It's why Jewish students had to be locked up in the Hillel office, for their own protection, a few years ago.

Consider this test: instead of the mural in question, assume that the content depicts two young Palestinians. Instead of holding rocks behind their backs, the two figures are concealing knives in their waistbands. Not far away stands a mother, identified as Jewish, with small children. The meaning would be clear – in fact, it would reflect the reality of life in Israel today.

Michael Diamond

It would be art. It would be presenting a point of view. If we are to have free speech, it should be permitted. But ask yourself this: would that mural ever be hung in the student centre? And would we even want it to be?

Free speech must allow for multiple sides of an issue to be explored – freely, without antagonism or threats. But when it comes to being pro-Israel on campus, I would suggest that this sort of freedom simply does not exist. To support the Palestinian Roots mural on the basis of free speech is unacceptable, because free speech, in its true sense, is absent at York.

> If Bronfman feels aggrieved, why wouldn't he remove his support from York, and in so doing effectively announce: 'Not in my name, and not with my dollars.'

Coming back to Paul Bronfman and any other university donor, Jewish or otherwise, they have a right to know that their dollars are generating a positive return, as defined by the donor. If not, there is no point in making the donation. If Bronfman feels aggrieved because of the mural, why wouldn't he remove his support from York, and in so doing effectively announce: "Not in my name, and not with my dollars." Perhaps he has decided to redirect those funds to an initiative that will counter the one-sided nature of Middle East political commentary at York or other universities. After all, that is his right and, some would say, his obligation.

Those benefiting from the opportunity to be part of a university environment should remember that they do so only with the support of the larger society, through taxes and donations. That support suggests no group should experience the noxious environment that too many Jewish students feel today at York. Paul Bronfman has brought this issue to the surface where it belongs. The university administration has responded – it will be judged on the outcome of the process it puts into place, not on the process itself. ■

Remembering Eugene Borowitz

Rabbi John Moscowitz

The great theologian Rabbi Eugene B. Borowitz died Jan. 22 at age 91. The author of a dozen and a half books on contemporary Jewish theology, Rabbi Borowitz taught hundreds of rabbinic students during a long and distinguished career as professor at the Hebrew Union College (HUC) in New York.

I was one of those students, and one day in the fall of 1981, Rabbi Borowitz forcefully – but fairly – rearranged my thinking, even if I didn't understand this at the time.

The practice at HUC was for final year rabbinic students to preach their "senior sermon" before the entire community of students and faculty – and, afterwards, to receive feedback in a public forum. When it came my turn, I delivered a good sermon, I thought, maybe even a very good one. During the feedback session that followed, it became clear that others thought so, too. (At the end of that year, mine was awarded best senior sermon.)

But as things were wrapping up that day, the one person I'd kept a wary eye on all the while finally piped up. Rabbi Eugene B. Borowitz rose and cleared his throat. "I hate to crash your party, John," he said.

The room grew quiet.

He continued: "All the nice things you said just now are wrong. This was not a good piece of work. In fact, it can't properly said to be a 'sermon.' When you spoke about the relationship between Abraham and Sarah as you did this morning, in effect, you taught through the lens of therapy. Rabbis choose the prism of the Torah as the primary way to understand the world. Yours was not a sermon – it was a message to us to go into therapy. I'm not adverse to therapy, but in shul, I prefer Torah, not Freud. Shouldn't you?"

I told Rabbi Borowitz that he had not heard what I'd said correctly: I was teaching Torah, I asserted, as respectfully as I could. We went back and forth for a few minutes, and I wondered to myself, had I gotten it all wrong? The leading Jewish thinker seemed to be saying so. I took the subway home to the Upper West Side that afternoon feeling jostled intellectually, a little uncertain and a lot curious.

I thought often about Rabbi Borowitz as the years went by. We'd speak here and there. I always brought up my student sermon, and he'd always remember with a kind of curious twinkle – almost as if saying, "You're coming along, aren't you?"

It all remained vague for me until a decade or so later when, while listening to Rabbi Borowitz speak at a conference in Montreal, I understood not only how right he'd been, but more importantly, that I'd been changing all along. I had, in fact, become accustomed to teaching and thinking less in a therapeutic vein, and I was becoming far more animated by the remarkable intellectual tradition of the Jews. Specifically, the minds of the great rabbis, of whom Rabbi Eugene Borowitz was surely one.

I approached Rabbi Borowitz after his speech that day and confessed my full realization that he'd gotten me right years earlier. I thanked him for setting me straight that day in an unvarnished and, actually, loving way.

I don't quite remember his words in response, but I do remember that he was hardly surprised by my change. More than that, his twinkle, his look of pleasure, was brighter than ever. After all, the student had finally learned the Torah of the teacher. ■

Rabbi John Moscowitz is rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto and the author of Evolution of An Unorthodox Rabbi (Dundurn Press, 2015).

Finding strength through leadership

Daniel Held

There are many ways to measure the strength of a community.

We can count individuals: affiliation rates, Jewish knowledge, attachment and attitudes. Demographic surveys such as the Pew study describe the community through this lens.

We can assess the strength of institutions: the number of students enrolled in day schools or attending Jewish summer camps, membership rates at synagogues or donations to federations.

Both of these types of measures offer important snapshots of the current state of affairs. But in looking to the future, they offer little more than the ability to extrapolate current trends.

A stronger predictor of the Jewish future is the strength of communal leadership.

Late last month, the boards of five agencies, each serving large networks of American Jewish day schools, voted to dissolve themselves and merge into one new entity. In a bold move, Pardes, serving Reform day schools; PEJE, the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education; the Schechter Day School Network, representing Conservative schools; RAVSAK, strengthening community day schools; and the Yeshiva University School Partnership, serving modern Orthodox schools, all committed to folding their own structures into a new, unified Jewish day school organization. Together they serve nearly 100,000 students in over 375 schools.

It's an audacious decision, breaking down silos and redeveloping the landscape of agencies serving day schools. It's also risky. The new organization will have to overcome barriers to change and decades-old entrenchments, and bring together what can be disparate elements of the field.

This is the type of bold leadership that foretells a strong community. The five agencies each had its own area of expertise. Some were good with curriculum and others at placing staff, some focused on professional development and others on integrating technology. The boards recognized that combining efforts will allow these strengths to be accessed by all schools. Moreover, they saw duplication. The merged entity will facilitate streamlining of services, fundraising, staffing, advocacy, marketing and other areas.

It's this view of a unified field that marks the critical leadership lesson of the merger. Too often we fall into the trap of the status quo, perpetuating the functions and structures that have been in existence for decades. At times, these entrenched positions lead to territorialism, with organizations – of all types – vying for constituents, donors or members. While individual organizations often seek to grow their piece of the pie, today's reality necessitates that the pie itself will grow. The new merged entity will develop a unified voice for day school education, a single repository of data and knowledge, and a strong voice to advocate for and represent the field.

The decision to merge will surely benefit day schools, but the lessons learned should be applied more broadly.

How could our community benefit from greater collaboration across agencies? Are the denominations that once stood at the centre of Jewish communal life still relevant to the institutional needs of a new generation? Are our fundraising organizations – many of which tap the same donors to meet similar philanthropic needs – optimized to raise the funds necessary to fuel our community's growth? Is the constellation of communal agencies – schools, synagogues, camps, advocacy organizations, kashrut supervisors, etc. – many of which were established in generations past, still the right kind of grouping?

The boards of the five day school agencies exercised strong communal leadership. They looked beyond the narrow scope of their own organization to consider the changing needs of field they serve. They exercised leadership that, while risky, resulted in a dramatic change in a historically stagnant the landscape.

Our strength cannot be measured only by looking at the individuals or the agencies that currently constitute the community. Rather, in looking forward, our strength will be measured by the leadership needed to serve a changing community. ■

Are we placing stumbling blocks before the disabled?

Jean M. Gerber

"You shall not place a stumbling block before the blind"

Some time ago, I wrote about the many varieties of Jewish life within our communities, ending with a take on the motto, e pluribus unum, out of the many, one.

For Jews, I argued, it should be: "Out of the one, many." The "many" include children and adults with special needs.

Is it true, as recent billboards have it, that "I have a career because someone could see my ability"? Or, too often, is it a turning away from people whose abilities no one can see? These individuals may be invisible. That is, we see them – but we don't. Whether the issue is a mental illness, delayed development, autism spectrum or other disabling manifestations, they often melt into the woodwork.

The love Jewish parents show their children cannot be measured. Parents link us to the past, children point toward the future. Children have always been the precious jewels of the community.

But children with special needs, whether physical or developmental challenges or mental illness, often find short shrift. They may be denied a Jewish education, or their parents may be continually exhausted by the search for treatment, not to mention compassion and understanding.

Of course, adults with special needs started out as children, usually with the same issues. And while we have made some strides forward in accommodating children in day and supplementary Hebrew schools, we may forget about them when they reach adulthood.

They become the clients of an agency – or not. Maybe one agency has a staff position finding jobs for immigrants – but not for those who have grown up in the community. Sorry, no help here. Try the government job bank.

What is the numerical estimate of Jews with special needs? We got some estimates from local federation sources. These "guesstimates" are for British Columbia, so I assume that similar percentages apply to other communities.

There are approximately 27,000 Jews in B.C. Estimates are that mental illness affects 10 (maybe 15) per cent of the general population at any time. Thus 2,700 Jews in B.C. have chronic or episodic mental illness. Those with a developmental disability or on the autism spectrum cannot be accurately counted. What is known (Vancouver's federation produced a 2014 study of services for the mentally challenged) is that services provided through Jewish community agencies are woefully under-resourced, and over-worked.

Some – repeat some – assistance can come from government. (An example: according to the federation study, professionals agree that the pitiful monies provided by British Columbia are useless, and some people come to the end of their tether, if not their lives, never having received a dime.)

The main challenge for families is finding considerate and constant help. Here is where Jewish community services are vital.

One example of community awareness is a program of our local Jewish community centre, which serves up to 40 adults and 10 youths through social programs, training and employment, and parent education. Given the number of Jews with needs, it is small, and funding, staff say, is a big hurdle. The Jewish Family Service Agency provides some counselling, referral services, employment and housing assistance. But in the face of increasing demand, it is frustrating for staff to come up short in the assistance they can provide.

In the book of Exodus, which we are now reading in synagogue, there is a lot of seeing and not seeing, hearing and not hearing, not listening, not really understanding.

There can be a deafness overtaking communities when they face the scope of need. If you have never had a family member with special needs, you may not hear, may not understand the despair that overtakes those seeking help.

Maybe we are not physically placing stumbling blocks in front of blind people. But as a community we should see and hear the need and be able to respond. ■

Iranian elections may be a barometer of things to come

Paul Michaels

On Feb. 26, Iranians will elect members to both the 290-seat parliament and the more influential 88-member "Assembly of Experts."

On the surface, this looks like Iranian democracy in action. Yet, like any elections since Ayatollah Khomenei established the "Islamic Republic" in 1979, the upcoming ones will hardly be free.

The "Guardian Council," a 12-member body of ultra-conservative clerics, determines who runs in either election and excludes even moderate, let alone reform-minded, candidates – and certainly those calling for political freedom and improved relations with the West.

In January, the council excluded 8,000 of 12,000 candidates from running in the parliamentary elections and allowed a scant 30 of 3,000 to run for the Assembly of Experts, which, among other things, chooses the Supreme Leader, currently the ailing Ali Khamenei.

It was this hardline council that disqualified Hassan Khomeini, the 43-year-old grandson of the founder of the Islamic revolution, as having reformist tendencies and, therefore, lacking necessary "revolutionary credentials."

Iran's current president, Hassan Rouhani, often called a "relative moderate," was considered sufficiently revolutionary to run in 2013, but won on a promise to improve the economy – that is, to get biting UN-imposed financial sanctions, imposed because Iran had repeatedly violated the terms of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty (NPT), removed. This path required reaching a nuclear agreement with the international community. That was achieved last July, amid huge controversy, and was followed mid-January by the removal of sanctions when the agreement was "implemented," after United Nations nuclear inspectors certified Iran's compliance with restrictions to its nuclear program.

These restrictions, the key ones lasting 10 to 15 years, defer the time required for Iran to "break out" earlier to develop a nuclear weapon, a move that would cause the theoretical – but impractical – re-imposition of sanctions. Meanwhile, Iran remains a nuclear-threshold state.

At the same time, Iran benefits by the release of approximately $100 billion in previously frozen assets, unrestricted access to formerly forbidden oil markets and unlimited foreign investment opportunities. In short, Iran is open for business.

In theory, all of this should benefit Iran's beleaguered middle class, which has long suffered under sanctions that devalued Iran's currency and fanned inflation.

Yet much of the country's economy is controlled by the fanatical Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC), which, throughout the years of sanctions, always found ways to profit from illicit trade and other corruption. Now many predict that sanctions relief will enrich the IRGC, not the middle class. Moreover, because the IRGC fears any acceptance of the West or accompanying liberalizing trends, it has clamped down even harder on reform-minded citizens, imprisoning and torturing many journalists and human rights activists.

During the most difficult economic times, the IRGC funnelled billions to its terrorist proxies, including Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and Hamas. It will now be flush with cash to funnel even more to these groups as Shia Iran seeks to dominate the region.

Even U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry recently admitted that a portion of Iran's sanctions relief will almost certainly be used for terrorist activities. Yet, along with President Barack Obama, Kerry believes that reaching a nuclear deal with Iran will help to bring Iran, as a "responsible" actor, back into the family of nations.

Again, this optimism must be weighed against the aims of the 150,000-strong IRGC, led by Gen. Mohammed Ali Jafari, who is hostile to the United States and the West. Reporting directly to Ayatollah Khamenei, he's in charge of major aspects of Iran's nuclear and missile development programs. On both, he has cheated in the past and almost certainly – as with Iran's recent test firing of ballistic missiles in defiance of the UN Security Council – will in the future.

In this broader context, the results of Iran's approaching elections may well indicate how much worse things could get – for citizens of Iran and stability in the region and beyond. ■

York U reviews policies in wake of painting controversy

lsarick@thecjn.ca

After a tumultuous week at York University over a painting hanging in the school's student centre that some argue promotes violence toward Israel, university president Mamdouh Shoukri issued a statement intended to calm tensions at the school.

"It is clear that the subject of the artwork is offensive to some individuals and groups, particularly Jewish members of our community," Shoukri wrote in a statement issued Jan. 29. "The mural has given rise to a broader conversation about whether, as an institution and as individuals, we are doing all we can to ensure that all members of our community feel welcome and supported."

The school will form a President's Advisory Committee on Inclusion to "ensure inclusive respectful exchange of ideas, particularly on social and political issues," the statement said.

As well, the university is reviewing its policies to "better foster and protect an inclusive and positive learning environment." The process will include looking at the rules for student groups and organizations. The entire review is to be completed by the end of the year.

Shoukri's statement came in response to a decision last week by media mogul Paul Bronfman to withdraw his support for York's film and creative programs over the controversial mural.

Debate about the artwork, which has been covered widely in the media, has also brought into focus long-standing complaints about anti-Israel and anti-Semitic tensions at the university.

"As a Canadian, never mind as a Jew, the fact the administration would allow this piece of garbage to be displayed in a student lounge… This is something concrete I could point to and say, 'Take that thing down or you'll lose our support,'" Bronfman said in an interview.

As chair of Pinewood Toronto Studios and William F. White International, a supplier of film equipment and expertise, Bronfman has donated thousands of dollars worth of production equipment, invited students to open houses and offered seminars, learning labs and technical training to students in York's programs.

The painting in question, titled Palestinian Roots, was a winner in a student art contest and has hung in the student centre since 2013. It depicts a man holding rocks looking at a field and a bulldozer. On his back is a Palestinian flag and a map of Israel. Underneath the painting are the words "justice" and "peace" in several languages.

Bronfman, a director of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC), learned about the painting recently when the organization's CEO, Avi Benlolo, highlighted it in an email to supporters. Bronfman spoke with Shoukri and other senior administrators before making his decision, but he said their responses were inadequate.

"Their position is indefensible. It's a bunch of political, bureaucratic rhetoric. That's all I got from the president himself," he said. "It was just a bunch of legal nonsense and jargon."

Shoukri dropped into York's Hillel offices Jan. 27 and spoke informally with students for about an hour, said Anna Baev, director of Hillel York.

Paul Bronfman

"He was very sympathetic. He understood their perspective," Baev said. "It made them feel that they are being heard."

Many of the conversations were about the mural, and Shoukri stressed that the painting hangs in the York student centre and does not fall under the university's control.

In an earlier statement, the university wrote that it consulted with legal experts and concluded it could not compel the student centre to remove the painting.

Hillel has written to the student centre previously, and York's Hillel student president Natalie Slavat wrote an open letter to executive director Scott Jarvis, which was published in the Times of Israel Jan. 27, asking for the mural to be removed. Representatives of the student centre have not responded to Hillel, Baev said.

A spokesperson for the student centre also did not respond to The CJN's phone calls or emails.

In an email to the Globe and Mail, Gayle McFadden, the centre's vice-president of operations, said, "This artwork is not hateful and is the artist's depiction of the resistance to the occupation of Palestinian land.

"This painting is not anti-Semitic, as it is merely critical of the State of Israel and its continued occupation of Palestine."

In an earlier statement, the university said it "remains firmly committed to its values of freedom of expression, open dialogue and constructive discussion."

"We deeply regret Mr. Bronfman's decision and would like to thank him for his support. Our arts, media, performance and design students have benefited from the experiential learning activities made possible by his generosity," the university's statement concluded.

Hillel Ontario noted that according to the student centre art contest's own guidelines, the picture was only supposed to be on display for two years.

"Hillel has continued to stress to the university administration that we are deeply disturbed by the ongoing display of this mural," Hillel Ontario CEO Marc Newburgh said in a statement.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) concurred that the painting should have come down long ago.

"It is unfortunate that that the irresponsible decision of the student centre has put film students at York at a tremendous disadvantage, as they will no longer benefit from the multiple resources contributed by this generous donor," said Joel Reitman, CIJA's GTA co-chair.

Bronfman agreed York's students will bear the brunt of his decision, but said they can "blame the faculty, right up to the president.

"The tone in my company is set by me. The tone of that university is set by the president." ■

Waterloo students vote No to boycott of Israeli universities

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

University of Waterloo students have voted No in a referendum that called on the university to sever ties with Israeli academic institutions.

A two-week campaign to persuade students to vote either for or against the boycott followed, and on Jan. 28, Waterloo's Federation of Students (Feds) said 4,216 students had voted, with 2,329 of them voting No. Waterloo has about 30,000 undergraduates.

In October, a student group called Ethical Collaboration UW submitted a petition with about 4,400 signatures to Feds. It claimed that Palestinian students and teachers are routinely prevented from reaching their schools because of military checkpoints and roadblocks, and that they face systematic discrimination at the Israeli institutions that Waterloo has academic partnerships with, including the University of Haifa, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Tel Aviv University and Weizmann Institute of Science.

After the submission, Feds was tasked with verifying the signatures to ensure they came from registered undergraduate students. In early January, a referendum was called when the minimum requirement of 10 per cent of undergraduate student signatures was met.

Ilia Sucholutsky campaigns for the No side.

"Following this result, the official stance of the Federation of Students is that we do not have a stance on the University of Waterloo severing ties with the institutions mentioned in the referendum question," said Stéphane Hamade, Feds' vice-president of education. "This means Feds will not be advocating for this because of the results."

Ilia Sucholutsky, 18, a second-year mathematical science student who was part of the No campaign, said he was approached last year while waiting for a bus on campus.

"A couple guys were going down the line approaching each person, saying, 'Do you believe in human rights?' Of course we all said we believe in human rights, so they said, 'OK, sign this paper here.' I was put off by that and asked them what I was signing. Then they started talking about Israeli institutions and Palestinian human rights violations," Sucholutsky said.

After that encounter, he approached the student union and convinced them that part of the verification process should include a confirmation email to all the students who signed the petition to make sure they understood what they had signed.

"According to what I was told afterward, over 1,000 signatures were dropped from the petition based on those processes, so it came to about 3,000, which is just barely enough [to trigger a referendum]," Sucholutsky said.

Supporters of the No campaign drafted letters against the boycott that were signed by students and Waterloo faculty members, and they also took part in a public debate that was streamed live on the student union website.

Although students voted against severing ties with Israel, Sucholutsky said a Yes result likely would not have made a difference to the administration.

"The administration is very much committed to their relationship with Israel. The president of the university spent a month in Tel Aviv last semester building relationships with Technion, but for the student union, [if students had voted Yes] it would be binding on them to do something about it," he explained.

"For me, it's never been about these ties actually getting severed. We know that it's not going to happen, but it is more about how it is polarizing the student body. It is creating this toxic environment," he said.

He credited the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, Hillel Ontario and StandWithUs Canada for giving pro-Israel students the guidance and resources they needed to mount an organized response to the anti-Israel movement on campus.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center called the result "a stunning victory" and "another blow to the BDS movement on campuses across the country."

Waterloo spokesperson Nick Manning said that the university "values free speech and freedom of expression and we believe that it is important that universities provide an environment where students can debate the issues that are important to them." ■

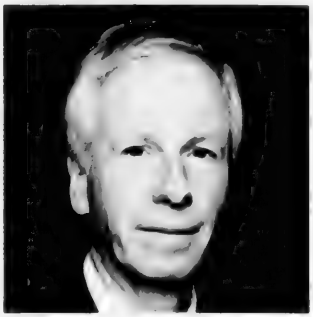
Dion's Israel comments spark concern, support

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca



Stéphane Dion

Under the government of former prime minister Stephen Harper, Canada pledged to stand beside Israel "through fire and water," but critics say the government of Justin Trudeau hasn't stood by Israel for even four months.

It was a Jan. 24 statement by Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion that raised concerns – at least in some quarters. Dion delivered a message to his Israeli counterpart warning against expansion of Jewish settlements.

"Canada believes strongly in a two-state solution and that negotiations provide the only viable path to peace," he stated. "As a steadfast ally and friend to Israel, Canada calls for all efforts to be made to reduce violence and incitement and to help build the conditions for a return to the negotiating table. Unilateral actions, such as Palestinian initiatives toward statehood in international forums and continued Israeli settlements, are unhelpful and constitute serious obstacles to achieving a comprehensive, just and lasting peace."

A day later, Joe Pickerill, Dion's spokesperson, told the Jerusalem Post that, "We're steadfast allies and good friends, and good friends can occasionally deliver tough messages, but it's by no means to suggest that we're somehow retreating from any kind of support of Israel."

Canada was not trying to create a "faux balance" by equating violence by either side, Pickerell told the Post. "We're not necessarily equating the violence by any means on both sides, but there have been issues, and we need to be in a position to point that out."

Dion's remarks came only days after Israel announced the end of an 18-month settlement freeze, during which the Palestinian Authority not only failed to resume negotiations with Israel, but continued violent incitement, praised terrorist attacks on Jews and named public spaces after terrorist perpetrators.

Commentators noted the difference in tone between Dion's statement and those of the previous Conservative government, which was acknowledged to be steadfastly pro-Israel. Within the Jewish community, elements from left and right interpreted Dion's comments differently.

Hart Schwartz, acting chair of JSpace-Canada, a left-wing Zionist organization, said, "Any true friend of Israel should indeed point out the harm caused to Israel by the expansion and proliferation of settlements. A good friend does not let a good friend drive drunk. The ongoing development of settlements is bad for Israel, bad for Israeli democracy, bad for Israel's economy and bad for Israeli security.

"First, they are widely perceived to be an effort to sabotage a peace treaty that would include Palestinian sovereignty.

"Second, when all 27 ministers of foreign affairs of the European Union claimed in 2012 that the expansion threatens to make a 'two-state solution impossible,' followed by the failure of the Kerry initiative [to bring the two sides back to negotiations based on pre-1967 borders], Israel cannot be surprised that the response, in 2015, is the odious labelling requirement on Israeli goods from the West Bank.

"Third, settlement expansion leads to despair among the disenfranchised Palestinian population, making extremism that much more attractive and undermining Israeli security from within.

"[The Jan. 24 Israeli] announcement giving the green light to more settlements should be criticized by the Canadian government, not ignored. While not condoning violence from the Palestinians, the foreign minister's balanced, careful, comments, should not be seen as anti-Semitic, but rather as decidedly pro-Israel," Schwartz said.

Paul Rotenberg, vice-president of the right-wing Toronto Zionist Council, offered a different perspective. He suggested Dion had ignored the context of the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians, which he traced back decades.

Before 1948, Jews could build anywhere in the area, he said. When Jordan occupied Judea and Samaria (the West Bank), it excluded Jews from living in the area, but that was reversed in 1967 following the Six Day War. He also wondered why the period of "ethnic cleansing" is held up as some sort of standard that should be emulated today.

Turning to the issue of peace talks, Rotenberg said the blame for the absence of negotiations lies squarely with the Palestinians.

Shimon Fogel

"Israel has asked the Arabs to return to the negotiation table so many times you can't count them."

In fact, Rotenberg continued, "[Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud] Abbas has resisted pressure from [President Barack] Obama to go to the negotiating table and [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's requests to go to the negotiating table."

"If Dion wanted to be balanced, he would have addressed Abbas and asked him why he doesn't return to the negotiating table," he added.

Abbas has a plan for Judea and Samaria, which "is ethnic cleansing. He's said all Jews must leave," Rotenberg added.

University of Toronto pyschology professor Stuart Kamenetsky, a Tory supporter, said, "I'm obviously not pleased with Dion's comments. It's not even about the settlements. It's back to the moral equivalence between Palestinian murderous terror and Israel's actions. It's the hollow and superficial approach of condemning violence on both sides to end hostilities. This shows no understanding of the situation, let alone history."

Commenting on Dion's statement, Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said, "We are disheartened to learn the government seems to place the blame for the failure of peace talks on the settlements, when it is clear that settlements are used as a smokescreen to hide the real reason for lack of progress: the utter unwillingness of the Palestinian leadership to accept the existence of Israel within any borders whatsoever.

"Abbas himself admitted he rejected a peace offer in 2008 'out of hand.' If the new government wishes to play a significant role in helping the peace process along, it must first address the ongoing provocation in the West Bank, the rockets fired by Hamas, and the general acceptance of and praise for anti-Jewish violence and incitement to terror."

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) cut the government more slack. Shimon Fogel, the organization's CEO, said, "We identify no change in the level of support for, or appreciation of the challenges facing Israel. While the Liberal government's overall approach favours engagement (e.g., Iran), there has not been any change in its understanding of the considerations that should determine the orientation of Canadian policy.

"Justin Trudeau has been unequivocal and clear: Canadian policy under a Liberal government will not change as to the nature and quality of support for its only democratic ally in the Middle East, Israel," Fogel said.

However, Fogel suggested the government was on the wrong track in focusing on Israeli settlements as an obstacle to peace. "We reject that view, insofar as the actual historical record is absolutely clear on the extent to which various Israeli governments have been willing to compromise in order to achieve peace, including the dismantling of communities in disputed territory," he said.

"In a recent meeting with the minister, CIJA asserted that there has been virtually no construction in Judea and Samaria over the last number of years and none at all outside the settlement blocs already established. So the false narrative of settlements being a defining impediment is more a fiction today than a reality. The only true obstacle is the rejection of the legitimacy and permanence of a Jewish state in our ancestral homeland."

Conservative spokesmen Tony Clement and Peter Kent said Dion's statement did not blame Hamas for recent terrorist rocket and knife attacks. "The statement only expressing 'concern,' and by omission, equates such terrorist attacks with Israeli settlement construction. This is unacceptable." ■

10 Things We Must Know about Anti-Semitism – If We Want It Stopped

Dr. Michael Laitman
Professor of Ontology

I believe the time has come to clear up some misconceptions about anti-Semitism.

1) What is anti-Semitism, and what it isn't? Anti-Semitism is not about religious disputes. The Holocaust had nothing to do with religion, and everything to do with race. But anti-Semitism is also not about race, since the Christians in the Middle Ages and Muslims today cite religious reasons. Anti-Semitism is also not because the Jews are rich, since the majority of Jews killed in pogroms in Eastern Europe and in the Holocaust were destitute and practically penniless. This didn't win them any mercy. Today anti-Semitism is disguised as anti-Israelism, but we mustn't forget that the worst horrors happened to the Jews when there was no state of Israel to blame. Actually, anti-Semitism is an intense gut-feeling that the Jews are the cause of all the troubles in the world. This is why there is anti-Semitism where there aren't any Jews, and why the Jews are blamed for problems that cannot logically be attributed to them.

2) Easy scapegoats: The going narrative is that whenever things get bad, the Jews are the easiest scapegoat, so leaders and policy makers divert the public's anger toward them. This is not the case. People always feel that the Jews are to blame for everything that's wrong; it's just that when life is bearable the anger toward them is muffled by a cloak of culture and political correctness. Therefore, the worse off things become worldwide, the more we can expect global anti-Semitism to increase.

3) Anti-Semitism is a result of ignorance: Many of us think that anti-Semites are ignorant and therefore anti-Semitic. Those who think so believe that if anti-Semites knew how much the Jews have contributed to the world in science, culture, and arts, they would change their minds about us. Indeed, some anti-Semites are ignorant. But the majority of them, especially the fierce and outspoken among them, are well educated people. They know very well what Judaism has done for the world, but they don't care because they feel that compared to the harm that Jews are causing, our contribution is inconsequential. This is how demonic they see us.

4) It's a political problem: Many Jews feel that if Israel were to allow more freedom to the Palestinians it would mitigate anti-Semitism. Of course we should be as humane as possible toward all people. But thinking that giving the Palestinians land will mitigate anti-Semitism is simply wishful thinking. Anti-Semitism has been around before the establishment of the Jewish state, and it will continue to exist even if we give away the entire country to the Palestinians, because land is not the issue, it's that gut feeling described above.

5) Our gift to the world: The one thing we Jews have given and that everyone would love to embrace is the tenet, "love your neighbour as yourself." Yet, the anti-Semites' most passionate argument is that we are warmongers and spread hatred throughout the world. This is the exact opposite of the tenet that everyone agrees is wonderful, and none can implement.

6) Living up to our word: In keeping with item 5, the one thing that the world would like us to give, in addition to the tenet we've already given, is a way to implement it. With the world on the brink of global mayhem, the ability to live by this concept is the one thing that everyone desperately needs, will passionately embrace, and that will dissipate anti-Semitism. However, it is contingent upon our ability to prove that we are true to our word, that we practice what we preach.

7) Who's your foe? According to the previous item, our biggest challenge is not ISIS. It is also not Fatah, or even the overt anti-Semitism of the UN. Our biggest challenge is our own hatred for one another. We cannot offer a viable solution to the clouds of war amassing on the horizon unless we implement the tenet we have "exported" among us first. At the same time, we cannot sit by idly and let these clouds rain down because the world will say that we have brought them down on them.

8) Don't change; connect above the differences: The beauty of the "love your neighbour as yourself" solution is that we need not agree on anything. We can continue to merrily disagree on anything and everything under the sun: how to solve Israel's security problems, why the world hates us, how to reverse the warming climate, the origins of Falafel, or whether Cleveland Cavaliers owes all its success to LeBron James or perhaps some credit should also go to Coach David Blatt. We don't need to worry about our disagreements; we need to worry about our hearts! The more we can unite our hearts atop the disagreements, the better example we will set to the world. A united Jewish people cannot be regarded as a warmonger, since our unity is not aimed against anyone; it is unity for the sake of enjoying its benefits.

9) Setting an example: As said above, anti-Semites blame us for causing all the troubles in the world. But think about this: Have you ever looked at a peaceful looking person and thought, "He's a warmonger?" Accordingly, when we stop quarreling among ourselves the world will regard us as peaceful. We will become an example of implementing the tenet, "love your neighbour as yourself," which everyone so craves. When people see us as an example of mutual care and mutual responsibility, they will no longer hate us.

10) One step at a time: "Love your neighbour as yourself" was a lofty goal even back in the days, so Old Hillel said we can start from "That which you hate, do not do unto others." This starting point will also work for us. Connection and friendship are more than means for a more fun life; they're literally a life saver.

Montreal rabbi promotes prenup to address agunot

plungen@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Michael Whitman

South of the border, rabbis have been able to address the problem of agunot – women "chained" to their husbands because of the men's refusal to voluntarily grant a Jewish divorce – by promoting adoption of a pre-nuptial agreement that includes a stiff financial penalty for recalcitrant spouses.

It might be effective, but that type of prenup isn't enforceable under Canadian law, because courts here won't uphold monetary penalties imposed by rabbinic authorities. With that in mind, a modern Orthodox Montreal rabbi has crafted his own agreement that he believes is halachically compliant, meets Canadian legal standards, and is intended to substantially reduce, if not eliminate, the problem of agunot.

Rabbi Michael Whitman, senior rabbi at Adath Israel Poale Zedek Anshei Ozeroff, recently released his "Halachic Prenup for Canada" and is urging rabbis who perform marriages to recommend it to couples about to tie the knot. In his case, he goes further. He won't marry couples who refuse to sign it.

But he may face resistance. Rabbi Elisha Schochet of the Toronto beit din (rabbinic court), who sits on matters of divorce, said the prenup he's seen isn't acceptable. "I don't think it will pass the beit din of Toronto or of Montreal," he said, adding, "In my opinion, it's not correct. There are positions stated there that are not halachically correct."

Rabbi Schochet, who lauded Rabbi Whitman's "good intentions," declined to say where the prenup fails. "This is a discussion for rabbis," he said. "Rabbinic discussions do not have a place in newspapers."

Rabbi Whitman believes his prenuptial agreement would work in Canada. It names a specific beit din in New York – the Beth Din of America – to adjudicate disputes and pledges the parties to comply with its orders. It also includes a provision requiring the couple to each get independent legal and rabbinic advice.

Rabbi Whitman said the prenup was developed in consultation with retired judges, lawyers and law professors to ensure it conforms to Canadian law.

It does so by not asking Canadian courts, which adjudicate matters such as civil divorce, from deciding issues of a religious nature, nor does it allow rabbinic courts, sitting as arbitration panels, to impose financial repercussions, which a civil court would not enforce.

Instead a Canadian court would be asked to look at a legally-binding document that obliges the parties to appear before the Beth Din of America, or another rabbinic court it designates, "for the purpose of following the direction of that beit din concerning giving/receiving a get (religious divorce) only."

The prenup goes on to require the parties to follow the beit din's suggestion of removing "barriers to religious re-marriage by obtaining a get... It is our intention to address any other issues that may need at that time to be resolved between us, separate from the giving and receiving of the get, outside the beit din proceeding."

Rabbi Whitman said that when similar prenups were adopted in the United States and Israel, "there are no cases of agunot." But, he continued, "it's like the polio vaccine. All we need to do is get people to take it."

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation is skeptical the prenup would be as effective as U.S. versions, which include provisions for a recalcitrant husband to pay support to their wife at a rate of $150 per day until he grants the get. That inducement is "essential" to its success but is missing in the Whitman prenup, rendering it virtually "toothless," he said.

"In a typical agunah situation, it's not that the person has forgotten to give a get," he said. Often the situation is heated and one of the parties "is trying to take revenge on the other. If you have a bad actor, this is not going to help."

Yael Machtinger has studied the situations faced by agunot and is preparing to defend her dissertation at York University's socio-legal studies program on the subject. In the past year or so, she's interviewed about 40 agunot in Toronto and New York.

She's discussed the issue with Rabbi Whitman and lauds him for trying to find a solution, but says its effectiveness is still debatable. Until a civil court rules on the prenup's validity and a rabbinic court addresses it, it's unclear whether it's enforceable, she said.

Furthermore, Rabbi Whitman's prenup bypasses the Toronto-based beit din and refers disputes to the Beth Din of America, an arm of the U.S.-based Rabbinical Council of America. "There might be some people whom that makes uncomfortable," she said.

Despite her concerns, Machtinger said "on its face, I think it's a wonderful that this document exists, whether it is legally valid or not. It creates a social movement, a social conversation." ■

Two states still possible with leadership, panel agrees

All three panelists at the first-ever Bronfman Debate on the Future of Israel, held Jan. 28 at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs, agreed that it's not too late for a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but Israeli leaders have shown little willingness to bring it about.

Entitled "Beyond the Two State Solution," the event was the first of four debates in a series on Israel's future hosted by U of T's Andrew and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies.

It featured Yossi Beilin, a former Israeli justice minister and initiator of the Oslo peace process and the 2001 Geneva Initiative; Ha'aretz columnist Peter Beinart, associate professor of journalism and political science at the City University of New York; and Mira Sucharov, associate professor of political science at Carleton University and a columnist at Ha'aretz and The CJN.

The focus was the speakers' responses to the question – posed by moderator Emanuel Adler, the Andrew and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies – about whether they agree with the oft-stated assertion on the Zionist left that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has reached such a dire point that it's now, or will soon be, "too late" for a two-state solution.

Each stressed that two states remains achievable and is preferable to a one-state solution, and that the status quo of occupying the West Bank continues to threaten Israel's democratic character.

Beilin diverged somewhat, however, in that he said his ideal scenario for the region is a variation on – though not, he stressed, "mutually exclusive to" – a two-state solution: an Israeli-Palestinian confederation.

He said this would mean having separate Israeli and Palestinian states, as well as the establishment of an independent third government that jointly represents both peoples.

He held up the European Union, in which "sovereign states decide together which authorities to hand over to a joint authority," as an optimal model.

"I've come to the conclusion that it's better to speak about a confederation now than at a [later] stage… because then we won't have to evacuate settlements all. Some of them will be under Israeli sovereignty once we decide upon a new border, which we'll negotiate on the basis of the 1967 borders, with symmetrical land swaps," Beilin said

"Rather than evacuate the settlers, we'll tell them, 'We're leaving the territories, if you want to stay there…you'll remain an Israeli citizen, but a resident of Palestine. If you want to go back to Israel, you'll be compensated. And Palestinian citizens who want to live in Israel as residents can remain in Israel if they wish," he added.

In the next several years, demographic trends will leave a minority of Jews dominating a majority of Palestinians and that "the world, or rather, America, won't accept it," Beilin said.

"When [this becomes a headline] in the New York Times… then whoever the Israeli prime minister is will do what [former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon did [in Gaza] and unilaterally withdraw from the West Bank."

Sucharov said Israel's status quo is tenable, but unacceptable.

While it's currently less difficult and more plausible to reach a two-state solution, she said a one-state solution should, "in its democratic form, remain as an alternative if the two-state solution doesn't come to fruition. That's something everyone's going to have to decide in their own hearts, because we don't know when it's 'too late' [for two-states]."

Beinart argued that a two-state solution, while harder to achieve than before because of West Bank settlement growth, isn't impossible, but said, "I see no evidence that this Israeli government is interested in moving toward a two-state solution or encouraging signs in Israeli culture that things would move in that direction."

While he prefers two states to one, he said there must be serious pressure on Israel for it to move toward the former.

"I wrestle with to what degree could the idea of a one-state solution be useful as a threat even if it's not the outcome I want." ■

Montreal cantor and choir sing at UN Holocaust event

CJN STAFF

Cantor Gideon Zelermyer and the synagogue choir of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim performed at the United Nations' Holocaust memorial ceremony on Jan. 27, the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz and the day designated by the UN for international commemoration of the victims since 2005.

The 12-member, all-male choir was conducted by Shaar Hashomayim's music director Roi Azoulay.

"It's an important honour for us in Montreal, which we know has one of the largest survivor communities in the world," said Zelermyer, a Connecticut native.

"For me personally, my family is from Holland, and at least 50 of my relatives were killed in the Holocaust. It is a privilege to honour their memory in this way."

He added: "And Roi Azoulay comes from Strasbourg [France], another community deeply affected by the Holocaust."

Zelermyer said he was approached by a UN representative after he performed at a concert in New York and was invited to sing at the next Holocaust commemoration.

"Two of my closest friends are cantors in New York who had sung [at the event] in previous years, [but] they had never had a choir, as well as a cantor, at the event," he said. "I insisted that what made music at the Shaar so special was the collaboration between the choir and myself, and [the UN] agreed."

Director Roi Azoulay conducts the choir in the UN General Assembly Hall.

They were not only the first shul choir, but also the first Canadians to participate in the event, held annually at the UN General Assembly. They performed Ani Ma'amin and Kel Malei Rachamim, the memorial prayer. The ceremony included remarks by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and a keynote address by Beate Klarsfeld of Germany, an advocate for the prosecution of Nazi war criminals, as well as testimonies by two Holocaust survivors. The U.S. Military Academy at West Point Jewish Chapel Choir also sang.

Shaar Hashomayim, established in 1846, has a strong musical tradition. It's had a male choir dating back to 1887.

Zelermyer, a graduate of the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute, has performed around the world as a soloist. He and the choir have toured North America and the United Kingdom, and their series of recordings, The Music of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, has received critical acclaim.

Azoulay, previously music director of Strasbourg's Great Synagogue Choir, was born and raised in Dimona, Israel, the son of Moroccan immigrants. He's a graduate of the Jerusalem Academy of Music and Dance.

Zelermyer added: "The UN is clearly one of the important forums in the world for major world issues, and it is appropriate that this calamitous event is commemorated there."

The UN invitation was also a fitting follow-up to the shul's production of Sacred Echoes last November in commemoration of Kristallnacht. This multimedia cantata, featuring two cantors, an orchestra, children's choir and narration, is a tribute to the German Jewish liturgical repertoire.

In Montreal on Jan. 27, close to 600 high schools students heard Shoah survivors speak about their experiences in an educational program at the Grande Bibliothèque sponsored by the Azrieli Foundation.

Paris native Marguerite Elias Quddus, who was hidden as a child in farms and convents for three years, addressed the French session. The English speaker was Hungarian-born Leslie Vertes, who endured time in both Nazi and Soviet labour camps. Both are among the 42 survivors in Canada who have had their books published by the Azrieli Foundation over the past decade. ■

Students learn about Shoah victims their own age

sshefa@thecjn.ca

In honour of International Holocaust Remembrance Day on Jan. 27, students in Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and Quebec took part in a twinning program that educated them about Jewish children who were killed during the Holocaust.

Through the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's Twinning to Remember program, students were paired with a child victim of the Holocaust as a way of forging a connection between two identities.

"I thought this was a fantastic opportunity for my students to celebrate the life of the victims from the Holocaust," said Gina Lavine, a teacher at Collège Laflèche, a CEGEP school in Trois-Rivières, and a 2013 graduate of Yad Vashem's three-week educators seminar in Jerusalem.

More than 200 educators have been sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to take part in the course, which trains them to teach about the Shoah.

"When I told one of my students, 'You're going to be twinned with a victim of the Holocaust,' he said, 'Well, what's that?'" Lavine recalled. "A lot of them didn't even know what the Holocaust was. They had to do research on the Holocaust first to figure out what it was. They had not learned it. It's not in their curriculum."

Lavine, a Manitoba native, thinks she may be the only Jew in Trois-Rivières. "That's why for me it is so important to take on this mission to educate them about the Holocaust."

Larry Miculcik, a social studies and history teacher at the William Derby School in Strasbourg, Sask., said he never met a Jewish person until he went to university.

"I'm from a very small, rural community... I knew nothing about what it meant to be Jewish, and the best immersion into that was when I took a March of the Living trip for educators in 2010," he said.

Two years later, he took part in Yad Vashem's three-week program, and with the lessons he learned, he implemented the twinning program with the help of his fellow teachers. He said students learned about the origins of the Shoah and the rise and fall of the Nazis. "We covered what it means to be anti-Semitic and how Israel was created after World War II and that the Jewish People created a nation of their own after the war."

He said he'd been working with teachers of younger grades, from grades 5 to 9, to introduce the subject matter to them.

Each student was given a profile of a child along with a photo, and they were asked to access the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names to conduct research about who they were. The students then created a name tag to be worn on Holocaust Remembrance Day, and a larger photo of the child victims they researched was put up in the school hallways.

Grade 5 students in Saskatchewan on International Holocaust Remembrance Day

"It's a reminder to us that these were young people whose potential was never fully realized," Miculcik said, adding that this helps humanize numbers that are hard to fathom.

He said the project elicited many questions from the kids about human rights, "questions that I couldn't even answer, like, how was this possible? That's the big question, of course."

Lavine said we often hear testimonies of those who survived, but this was a chance to learn about those who didn't. "No one celebrates their lives. We talk about the survivors, but we don't talk about those who passed away, and I wanted to give a face to their name and make a connection to my students and the young people who passed away in the Holocaust," Lavine said.

"It was a very moving experience. I had students in tears because the way I worked, it was not just about reading a name and talking about a person."

Her students could choose to create a collage about the victim's life, write a poem or reflection, or write and present a monologue. "The authors of the monologues broke down in tears as they told their stories, because they felt the pain in the story." ■

Montreal rabbi to meet Pope to further Arab-Jewish ties

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A Montreal rabbi has been granted a private audience with Pope Francis, whom he wishes to thank for his outreach to the Jewish community and to appeal to him for support of Arab-Jewish dialogue in Israel.

Rabbi Boruch Perton of Beth Zion Congregation is scheduled to meet the pontiff at the Vatican on Feb. 24.

Rabbi Perton is an advocate for Hand in Hand, a network of fully integrated public schools for Arab and Jewish students that promote equality between the two peoples.

"I believe they hold the key to creating a shared society that can bring peace to the region," said Rabbi Perton. "I am going to see the Pope because I want to make a difference in the world and need the support of leaders of all faiths to do that."

He's encouraged that this rare opportunity indicates Pope Francis is open to hearing more about the schools, which now number six and want to expand They're located in Jerusalem (where the first one opened in 1998), Jaffa, Galilee, Haifa, Wadi Ara in northern Israel and, the newest, in Kfar Saba.

Enrolment and administration are equally divided among Jews and Arabs, and instruction is bilingual. There are more than 1,300 students and some 3,000 adults involved in the running of the schools.

Rabbi Perton said demand is high for more schools. "There are 10 additional communities begging for such schools to be built. There are over 1,000 children on the waiting list."

Rabbi Perton, an Orthodox rabbi, has made a personal effort to reach out to Muslim leaders in Israel and Montreal. His experience in Catholic-Jewish rapprochement, however, is limited.

Nevertheless, he did not hesitate to write to the Holy See's diplomatic envoy in Canada for a meeting. That was in September. Within a couple of months, he was in the office of Apostolic Nuncio Luigi Bonazzi in Ottawa.

Rabbi Boruch Perton

Rabbi Perton was accompanied by Father John Walsh, a Montreal priest who has long been active in interfaith dialogue, particularly with Jews, "who established my credibility." The two have worked on humanitarian projects together.

Bonazzi was enthused by Hand in Hand's mission and understanding of the rabbi's desire to express his appreciation for the Pope's respectful relations with Jews, especially the December statement issued by the Vatican against proselytizing, Rabbi Perton said.

"The Pope is trying to build bridges, and that is what Hand in Hand is also doing... Even if there are two states, there will still be 1.5 million Arabs living in Israel," he added.

"My goal is to raise the profile of the grassroots work of Hand in Hand in order that it can continue to move forward."

An official endorsement from the Pope would go a long way to giving the organization the "exposure" and "credibility" it needs to do that, he said.

It's not pie-in-the-sky, he added. The organization's approach "is working, it is making inroads, it's able to show results."

Hand in Hand has established an interfaith council of world religious leaders who believe in its goals.

"The Pope is a world leader and his support would impress a lot of people, inside and outside Israel, just as when [U.S] President [Barack] Obama had a Hand in Hand student light the menorah at the White House during Chanukah [of 2014]," Rabbi Perton said.

He estimates that 10 to 15 per cent of the Arab students at Hand in Hand schools are Christian. The Haifa one also has Ba'hai children.

But before discussing the schools, the rabbi plans to say yasher koach to the Pope for his "bold and brave" statements against anti-Semitism and the Church's historic attempt to convert Jews.

He said he's also grateful for the Pope's visit to Rome's Great Synagogue on Jan. 17 and for his earlier convivial relations with Jews in his native Argentina, particularly, Rabbi Abraham Skorka.

While some in Israel, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, were critical of Francis' praying at the security barrier during his 2014 visit to the Jewish state, Rabbi Perton is sympathetic to the Pontiff's gesture. "Every time I pass the security wall when driving in Israel, I also feel pain... Even though I view the wall as a necessary reality... It represents an inability to live in peace with our neighbours. It represents two sides that have not been able to build a lasting trust of one another."

While in Rome, he also hopes to meet with the Jewish community and possibly its chief rabbi, as well as Israeli embassy officials. And, of course, Rabbi Perton will invite Pope Francis to visit Beth Zion, a modern Orthodox congregation in Côte St. Luc of about 500 families, if he ever comes to Montreal. ■

Winnipeg synagogue sponsors two Yazidi families

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Winnipeg's oldest and largest congregation, has joined the local Jewish community's efforts to bring Yazidi refugee families to the city.

On Jan. 17, 70 members of Congregation Shaarey Zedek attended a meeting at the synagogue that officially launched Shaarey Zedek's campaign to sponsor two Yazidi families.

"It was nice to see that degree of support," said Lorne Weiss, vice-president of the synagogue's board of directors and co-chair of the Yazidi sponsorship campaign (along with board member Anita Neville, who is also a former Liberal member of Parliament for Winnipeg South).

"We received a significant number of pledges of financial support, and 15 congregants with specialized skill sets volunteered to help in the families' settlement," Weiss said. "We have also had a number of our shul members who are south for the winter call and pledge their support."

With their involvement, the Shaarey Zedek congregants have joined Operation Ezra, a Jewish community-wide effort to bring endangered Yazidi families to Winnipeg.

The Yazidi people are a Kurdish religious minority who were based in northwestern Iraq. An ancient people who practise a religion derived partly from Mesopotamian religious practices, they have long been persecuted by the surrounding Muslim society. Stories of their plight hit the headlines in August 2014 when Islamic State (ISIS) swept into their communities. Those who were unable to flee were taken into slavery – the younger women and children – or massacred. Many of the survivors are now living in refugee camps in Turkey.

"The need is urgent," Weiss said. "The Yazidis have their own refugee camps because they would not be safe living in refugee camps among displaced Syrian or Iraqi Muslims.

"As Jews, we cannot help but connect the Yazidis' plight with the situation of our own people in prewar Europe."

Operation Ezra was initiated last April by a relatively new pro-Israel Jewish group called Winnipeg Friends of Israel, who had made a connection with Nafiya Naso, a Yazidi living with her family in Winnipeg, who spoke at a meeting of Winnipeg Friends of Israel.

Naso has become the voice of the small Yazidi community in Winnipeg and has spoken to several other Jewish groups, including the Shaarey Zedek, over the past few months.

Operation Ezra is headed by co-chairs Michel Aziza and Belle Jarniewski. Among those who have joined the campaign are Jewish Child and Family Service, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and other Jewish community groups. Aziza said that, with Shaarey Zedek now involved, Operation Ezra is sponsoring seven Yazidi families, a total of 35 people.

"In 10 months, we have raised close to $180,000," Aziza said, "but we can always use more."

The first two families have been interviewed in Ankara by Canadian immigration officials and passed their medical exams, he said. "We hope that they will be arriving within the next few weeks. They are just waiting for visas."

Weiss said the Shaarey Zedek board decided last fall to look into sponsoring Yazidi families after hearing Naso describe the plight of her people.

"We determined that we were in a position to offer financial and emotional support to two families," he said. "We filled out the sponsorship applications with the help of the Mennonite Central Committee, who will be the legally recognized sponsorship holder. We will be functioning as a sub-agent."

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg will write the charitable receipts for the campaign, Weiss said, as the Shaarey Zedek constitution doesn't allow charitable receipts for this type of fundraising.

Shaarey Zedek must have $90,000 in place to support the two sponsored families by the time they arrive, he said. The congregation will also be responsible for finding adequate furnished housing and the other necessities of life.

"It will be a few months before our sponsored families come," Weiss said. "That gives us time to prepare. It isn't going to be easy finding a place to live for a family of 10. And we want to find them a place in a neighbourhood where there are already other Yazidi families."

Weiss said Operation Ezra has received enquiries from other Jewish communities about sponsoring Yazidi families.

Aziza said organizers would eventually like to bring up to 15 Yazidi families, including five sponsored through church groups who have expressed an interest in working with Operation Ezra. ■

Event mixes fun, support for SickKids

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Looking for something to do with your kids on Family Day this year – and do a mitzvah at the same time?

Jay Papernick, a Toronto-based financial advisor, is sponsoring his third annual "FUNdraiser" on Family Day, Feb. 15, to benefit the Hospital for Sick Children.

The event, geared for families with children age two to 10, is again at Active Kids Zone, an indoor playground and gym on Alness Street. It will run from 9:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m., with bouncy castles, arts and crafts, bumper balls, an open gym and a pizza lunch.

There will be "more and better prizes" than in the past, including hockey tickets and a signed Maple Leafs jersey, Papernick said.

Admission is free with a donation to SickKids. There is no minimum amount, but, if pressed, Papernick would suggest $10 to $20. Last year, almost 200 people attended, and the event raised $3,200 for SickKids Foundation, the fundraising arm of the hospital. Papernick hopes to raise even more this year. He is gratified to have heard parents at the event explain to their children where the money is going.

In fact, the initiative grew out of Papernick's own attempt, along with his wife, Amy, to teach their oldest daughter, now eight years old, and later their two younger children, about tzedakah and giving back to the community.

The Papernicks' daughter Layla was only three when a neighbourhood lemonade stand caught her eye while the family was driving past. They stopped, and Layla told her parents, "We should do that!"

Jay and Amy, a former teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School, liked the idea, and recognized a teachable moment. They explained that the money raised by selling lemonade was used to help people, and asked Layla where she might want to donate money from her own lemonade stand.

Layla liked the idea of helping children who were sick, having just been to SickKids herself because of a broken leg.

A lemonade stand at the Papernicks' home expanded the following year into a lemonade stand plus garage sale. The family has continued with the home-based event every summer except one, even after Jay decided to help the hospital through the larger event involving his office staff.

The Papernicks have always been passionate about giving to people in need, Amy said. In 2006 they raised $16,000 in three days to provide a Rosh Hashanah meal for Ethiopian olim in Safed, in the wake of the Second Lebanon War. They also paid their own way to Israel to be there for the dinner.

A branch owner of Assante Capital Management for the past couple of years, Jay, 43, encouraged his younger staff members early on to think about what they would like to do in the community. He particularly liked the idea of an event on Family Day, partly because he deals with many young families in his work, and also because the holiday was relatively new (it started in 2008), so he thought that many families with young kids wouldn't have set plans.

The Papernick family holds a cheque from last year's fundraiser

Other office initiatives include a bake sale at a downtown seniors home where one of the team volunteers.

Amy, who works in her husband's office, says the entire staff "jumped on board" with the idea of being involved in the community. "We deal with money every day, so it's nice to step outside and do something for the greater good." ■

Four marketing legends inducted into hall of fame

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some 300 marketers came out Jan. 21 to honour Jeanne Beker, Joe Mimran, Luke Sklar and the late Marshall McLuhan as the newest inductees into Canada's Marketing Hall of Legends at the American Marketing Association's (AMA) 11th Annual Marketing Hall of Legends.

The award was created to spotlight the stories, people and brands behind Canada's greatest marketing successes, recognizing a body of work and a lifetime of achievements in four categories: builder, visionary, enabler and mentor.

TV personality Ben Mulroney was the master of ceremonies at the event, held at the Liberty Grand.

All the inductees spoke about their business model and how their parents shaped their futures.

"Builder" Beker is best known as host of Fashion Television. She's written five books and curated her own fashion lines. Today, Beker is style editor at the Shopping Channel and a Globe and Mail columnist. In 2014, she became a member of the Order of Canada for her support of Canadian fashion and design.

"The sweetest thing of all is to receive an honour of this magnitude in your own hometown," Beker said.

"My parents were Holocaust survivors. My dad's big motto was, 'Don't be afraid and never give up. As long as you are fierce and tenacious, you will get through anything.'

"I felt I owed it to my parents to try to make something wonderful of my life, and I just went for it in a big way. Putting myself out there in myriad ways has really contributed to making me a kind of brand, because I wanted to experience it all."

"Enabler" Sklar and his team at Sklar Wilton & Associates has created longstanding partnerships over almost 30 years with many of Canada's most iconic brands, including Molson Coors, Canadian Tire, Tim Hortons and Shoppers Drug Mart.

"My dad was an entrepreneur, a creative guy, and an Olympian," Sklar said. "He and his brother started Sklar furniture. I watched him walk through the factory. He would pull the production guys together with the design guys, and they would just solve the problem. More smart people thrown at the problem was always a better solution for him. My work ethic and desire to help people comes from years of watching my father and his disciplined routine. We just try and live that and reward that and improve that everyday."

McLuhan was inducted in the "mentor" category. Known as the father of modern media studies, the communications theorist was a progressive and controversial figure who famously coined the term "global village" in his 1962 book The Gutenberg Galaxy. His groundbreaking 1964 book Understanding Media introduced one of McLuhan's most paradigm-shifting concepts: "the medium is the message."

Accepting his award was son Michael.

"Marshall McLuhan was the most amazing inclusive encyclopedic mind I have ever met or known, and I had the honour of being his son. A lot of people today don't know that somebody came up with the concept of the global village, which, of course, led to the term 'globalization.'"

"Visionary" Joe Mimran is best known for creating a succession of brands and retail concepts, including Club Monaco, Caban and most recently Joe Fresh. He currently stars on the popular CBC show Dragons' Den and chairs Gibraltar Growth Corp., a private investment company in Toronto. He also chairs the Fashion Design Council of Canada.

"I think every brand has a journey and a story to tell. That is what we are as brand builders: we are storytellers," he said.

"It was my mom who got me interested in fashion. She used to make clothes for me. My mom was one of the hardest-working women. She worked during the day as a seamstress. When she came home at night, my background music was a sewing machine." ■

Markham Chabad shul feeds homeless downtown

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

"God bless you," Jean Paul Boulanger, a young man down on his luck, yelled out to a group of about 100 people gathered near a table piled with blankets, scarves, gloves and hats in the parkette at the corner of Queen and Church streets.

Boulanger, who became homeless after a car accident, was sipping a Tim Hortons double double and clutching a couple of blankets and some gloves that were given to him by a group of congregants from Chabad Lubavitch of Markham on Jan. 24.

He was one of the many homeless people milling about the parkette in downtown Toronto, where Chabad of Markham congregants of all ages were distributing warm clothing and blankets, and offering coffee and hot chocolate, courtesy of a Tim Hortons canteen truck parked nearby.

They even festooned trees in the parkette with colourful scarves, left for those homeless people too shy or proud to have direct contact with the volunteers who might come by after the shul congregants had left the area.

One of the people on hand to add some glamour and excitement for the many children who showed up with their parents was Jake Goodman, 13, the star of YTV's Max and Shred.

"I'm blown away by all the people who have come out and left their cushy homes in Thornhill," Rebbetzin Goldie Plotkin said.

She said the social action day was organized by Chabad of Markham's monthly tikkun olam program.

Her daughter, Matti Schurder, the youth program co-ordinator and an organizer of the event, said the turnout was excellent. "So many families came together to help out. We're all on a high to see the difference we can be making."

Each tikkun olam event is put together by a team of two volunteers from the sisterhood committee, she explained, noting that on this day, Stella Saul and Diane Gelb were the co-ordinators.

"It was spectacular," Saul later said in a telephone interview. "It was amazing to see all the volunteers who came out on a cold day and gave their time."

A bin was put out at the shul a few weeks before the event for members to donate blankets, scarves and hats, etc., and Saul said she was also able to get some corporate donations.

She praised Tim Hortons for offering a special truck allocated for community events. "The guys from Tim Hortons were amazing, and so were the police."

Saul said that one of the highlights of the day happened after many of the families had gone home. She and a few other volunteers went to a homeless shelter at Queen and Sherbourne to distribute the remainder of the items and serve coffee.

"There was a family who had once been homeless giving out containers of food they had made themselves. So we teamed up with them. They gave out food and we gave out coffee and blankets. It was amazing," she said.

"The rebbetzin and rabbi should be really be commended for their leadership."

The rebbetzin told congregants that this day's event had been timed to coincide with Tu b'Shvat. "On Tu b'Shvat we thank God for the trees and the fruit... We are fortunate. You are doing tikkun olam to share our good fortune with others."

Rabbi Avraham Plotkin said his congregants were getting more out of the day than the homeless recipients. "They're giving us life lessons, like what it is to be without socks and gloves."

He also said this kind of event gives Jewish people positive exposure outside of the community. "Things like this go a long way to fight anti-Semitism." ■

Gaza tunnels show Hamas preparing for a first strike

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

After quite a few attempts at concealment and denial, Hamas' military wing, the Izz ad-Din al-Qassam Brigades, on Jan. 28 released the names of "the seven heroes, men of Allah" who were killed earlier last week in the collapse of an attack tunnel in the Tufah neighbourhood in the north-eastern part of Gaza City, only a few hundred yards from the Israeli border.

At first, Hamas leaders tried to hide the fact that any of its members had been killed in the tunnel. Then they claimed that the men were merely missing. Finally, they released the names of seven of the 11 excavators who were there at the time of the collapse.

Hamas' statement read in part: "We trod the path of death for your lives' sake."

Several days earlier, Faiz Abu Smala, a journalist with close ties to Hamas, wrote on his Facebook page about a meeting with the local commander of Hamas' military wing: "He admitted to me that they were still working night and day, around the clock, and that the battle they faced would be a matter of the utmost importance, of life and death, and that they had no alternative but to work under all conditions."

The seven Hamas operatives who were killed were not the first victims Hamas' tunnels have claimed during their post-2014-war construction and reconstruction. Last month, one of Gilad Shalit's captors was killed inside a tunnel that collapsed near Khan Yunis. According to sources in Gaza, 12 other Hamas operatives were killed in tunnel collapses last year.

According to the commander, Hamas has already restocked its rocket supply and is ready for a new war. He also said that in the next round of fighting, Hamas would operate "inside the territory of 1948." This was a broad hint that Hamas plans to engage in terror attacks inside Israel using, among other means, its new and restored cross-border tunnels.

Some might say that these are empty threats of the kind that Hamas makes every so often. But a close look at what is happening right now in the Gaza Strip gives the opposite impression: 18 months after the last war, someone in Gaza is preparing the ground on the public level, and making preparations below ground on the military level, for large-scale escalation leading to another conflict with Israel.

Netanyahu vows to destroy Hamas tunnels

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu responded on Jan. 31 to critics charging his government was failing to deal with newly dug tunnels under the Israel-Hamas frontier, threatening to blow up the underground passages if need be.

"We are working methodically and calmly against all threats, including threats from Hamas, both with defensive and offensive measures. And of course, in the event we attack the tunnels in the Gaza Strip, we will act very forcefully against Hamas, and with much more force than Operation Protective Edge," Netanyahu told a conference of diplomats, referring to the 50-day war in the Gaza Strip in 2014.

Israel Defence Forces (IDF) officials and southern residents have expressed concern in recent days that Hamas is rebuilding a series of subterranean passages, used for attacking Israel, which were destroyed during the 2014 war between Israel and Gazan fighters.

During that war, Israeli troops uncovered and destroyed dozens of tunnels, but only after Netanyahu approved a ground invasion of the Strip.

Netanyahu told the diplomats that Jerusalem would have international backing for such a move, and warned Hamas not to "try us."

"I think they understand this in the region, understand this in the world," he continued. "I hope we won't need to, but our capabilities – both defensive and offensive – are developing rapidly."

Hours earlier, opposition leader Isaac Herzog called for the government to take action and bomb the tunnels, accusing Netanyahu's cabinet of being "idle" in the face of the Hamas threat.

"The political leadership must provide a clear public answer to the citizens. [It must] stop hesitating.... They must instruct the IDF to bomb the tunnels and destroy this threat. Especially if there are tunnels that have already crossed the border into Israel," Herzog said.

"Why are we waiting? For terrorists, with their weapons drawn, to emerge in a kibbutz or a moshav? The prime minister and the defence minister must provide an answer to the citizens.

"One day, we'll wake up and discover that, once again, we underestimated the seriousness of the threat," Herzog warned. "It will cost us in blood and terrible sorrow."

Last week, a senior defence official said Hamas' military wing had rehabilitated itself and was ready for a fresh round of hostilities with Israel. Other military leaders have said intensive tunnel rebuilding is underway.

On Jan. 30, the terror group publicized a new video clip, lauding what it called the unknown fighters who are "toiling day and night" to build the attack tunnels.

Over the weekend, residents of areas near the Gaza Strip complained that tunnel digging into Israel from the Hamas-run territory has come so close to their homes that it has caused their floors to shake.

The head of the Eshkol Regional Council, Gadi Yarkoni, told Israel Radio that many residents have been complaining of hearing – and feeling – increased underground digging activity in recent weeks. In addition, they were disappointed that the IDF has failed to build protective barriers against the cross-border terror tunnels – as it had promised it would after the summer 2014 war in Gaza.

Hamas, the Islamist terror group that rules the Gaza Strip, built dozens of tunnels into Israel, many of which were used to carry out attacks against soldiers during the 2014 war. The IDF said it destroyed over 30 tunnels during the war, and some officials said the army was surprised at the extent of the tunnel building.

A number of tunnels were used during the war to attack army installations. The IDF later said the tunnels had been dug as part of a plan to carry out a massive attack against an Israeli community, but when war broke out, Hamas fighters abandoned the plot. ■

Conditions in Gaza are deteriorating, residents say

The question is when and under what circumstances.

The numbers throw into sharp relief Hamas' determination to rehabilitate its tunnel project, which was badly damaged during Operation Protective Edge: Hamas has more than 1,000 people working around the clock, six days a week, to dig more and more attack tunnels under the border and into Israel. The inclement weather has not slowed the pace of the work, as the incident in Tufah demonstrates. This is because the tunnel project is deemed central, since Hamas believes it can use the tunnels (among other weapons) to carry out an "opening strike" that will give the impression of victory in any future round of fighting with Israel.

There are a few tunnels estimated to be crossing into Israel, but there may be more. Hamas is using concrete to line the tunnel walls, as it did in the past, and has sufficient access to such materials.

These tunnels are not the antiquated ones that were built along the Philadelphi Route at the beginning of the past decade; those were dug by amateurs at a medium depth of 7-8 metres. These new tunnels are being dug 30 metres deep, with sophisticated engineering equipment and more advanced technological support, including engineers' blueprints.

> Every time it seems that the situation has never been worse, it plummets even further.

Hamas probably does not want an escalation or another round of war at this time, as former Palestinian prime minister Ismail Haniyeh hinted in his latest speech. But not everyone in Hamas hangs on to Haniyeh's every word.

For the military wing, it is crucial to restore Hamas' image, which took a serious hit in the last war. That is why an "opening strike" is almost obligatory, certainly in light of the state of affairs in the Gaza Strip, where Hamas' popularity is steadily dropping because of the economic situation, among other reasons.

Other high-ranking Hamas officials, such as Yahya Sinwar, prefer the military wing's urgent approach to Haniyeh's more patient one. In their view, maintaining the status quo is untenable in Gaza, where rising unemployment and poverty rates, closed borders, and the erratic supply of electrical power could damage Hamas' ability to survive, particularly in light of the Egyptian embargo and the cutback in support from Iran.

Gaza keeps surprising us. Every time it seems that the situation has never been worse, it plummets even further. One example is this week's storm, which set a new record for electricity consumption in Israel. In Gaza, it caused a particularly long power outage. Instead of eight hours with electricity followed by 16 without, the people there had four hours on and 20 hours off.

The cold was particularly bad in Shejaiya, Beit Hanoun and several other neighbourhoods, where thousands of people whose homes were destroyed in the last war are living in prefabricated mobile homes with no proper insulation. Many homes were flooded in Khan Yunis, Hiza'a and several other places that had already been reduced to rubble during the last war with Israel. Almost everywhere in the Strip, groups of people could be seen huddling over burning barrels, trying to warm themselves in the frigid weather.

"The animals in your safari in Ramat Gan have it better than the people here," said Hisham, a resident of Gaza City, who visited the animal park near Tel Aviv in the 1990s.

Gaza has never been in such a bad humanitarian situation, residents say, calling it much more difficult than it was on the eve of the last war.

"Nobody is working, there are no construction materials in the market, and there is no money because there are no salaries," said H., also a resident of Gaza City. "Hamas officials do not receive regular pay; rather, they receive NIS 1,000 to 1,200 (about $350) every 50 days. The members of Islamic Jihad have no money either.

"This is going to lead to an explosion," said H. "It will be a miracle if 2016 ends without a war. It's not up to Hamas or Israel anymore." ■

French bid rewards Palestinian intransigence, PM says

STUART WINER
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Jan. 31 took France to task for its latest Israeli-Palestinian peace talks pitch, saying the proposal would spur Palestinian inflexibility by guaranteeing recognition of a Palestinian state in advance.

"This will be an incentive for the Palestinians to come and not compromise," Netanyahu said of the proposal in a press briefing before the start of the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem.

French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius had announced on Jan. 29 that France would shortly try to convene an international conference with the hope of enabling new Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, but that if the effort hit a dead end, Paris would recognize a Palestinian state regardless.

"The substance of negotiations is compromise and the French initiative, as it has been reported, in effect gives the Palestinians in advance reasons not to do so," Netanyahu said, adding that he expected the French to take their peace-making efforts seriously. "I believe that we will see a sobering up on this issue. In any case, we will work to bring this about and our position is very clear: We are prepared to enter into direct negotiations without preconditions and without dictated conditions."

> We are prepared to enter into direct negotiations without preconditions.

Senior Palestinian Authority (PA) official Saeb Erekat, for years the PA's top negotiator with Israel, said last Sunday that successful talks would be a boon for Israel and the Palestinians.

"I think if we succeed it is a win for both of us," Erekat told Army Radio, blaming the moribund state of negotiations on Netanyahu's government.

"This Israeli government believes that establishment of a Palestinian state is a losing situation for Israel," he said. "That is the crux of the matter, that is the crux of the problem."

When challenged over the Palestinian refusal to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, Erekat countered that the Palestinians had already recognized Israel within the 1967 borders.

"You are registered in the United Nations as the State of Israel and that is your name," he said. "We have already recognized Israel's right to exist in the 1967 border in peace and security. I pray and hope that the day will come when I will hear one Israeli official from this government say that we recognize the right of the State of Palestinian to exist in peace and security in the 1967 lines. Stop with this broken record of yours."

In announcing the plan, Fabius said his country has a responsibility as a permanent member of the UN Security Council to sustain efforts to reach a two-state solution.

"France will engage in the coming weeks in the preparation of an international conference bringing together the parties and their main partners, American, European, Arab, notably to preserve and make happen the solution of two states," he said.

Paris is hoping to hold the conference in the summer.

"And what will happen if this last-ditch attempt at reaching a negotiated solution hits a stumbling block?" Fabius said. "In that case, we will have to live up to our responsibilities and recognize a Palestinian state."

The Palestinian envoy to the UN, Riyad Mansour, said earlier last Friday that PA officials are waging a new campaign at the UN to revive peace prospects, with the starting point possibly a Security Council resolution condemning Israeli settlements. ■

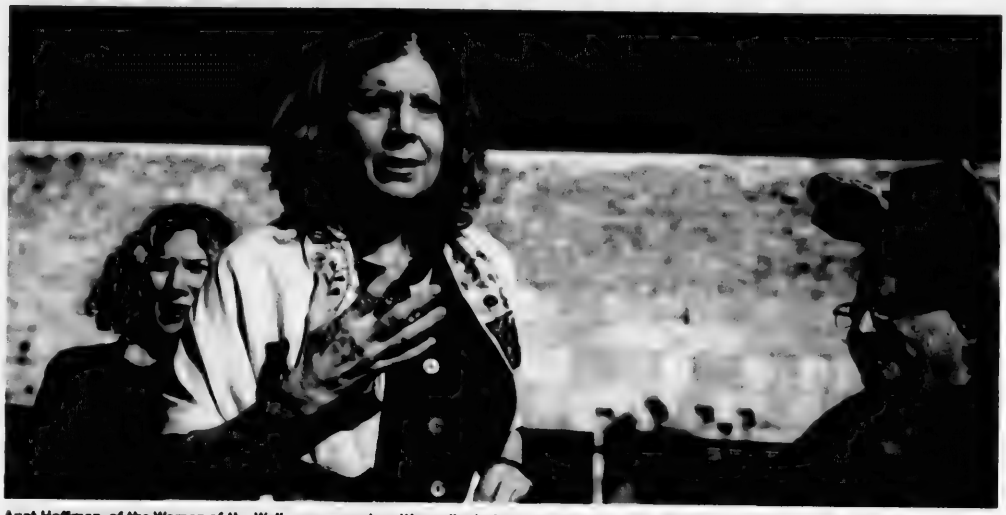
Wall prayer fight ends with a historic compromise

BEN SALES
JTA, TEL AVIV



Anat Hoffman, of the Women of the Wall group, speaks with media during a press conference with the group's response to the Knesset vote on the group's rights of prayer at the Western Wall, on Jan. 31. HADAS PARUSH/FLASH90

Israel's government approved a compromise to expand the non-Orthodox Jewish prayer section of the Western Wall on Jan. 31, putting to rest the decades-long fight between Women of the Wall and Israel's haredi Orthodox religious establishment.

The deal achieves what had been an elusive goal: an interdenominational consensus on Judaism's holiest site with official recognition. The non-Orthodox prayer section at the wall will become much larger and more accessible. But haredi control of the Orthodox section will also be solidified, though non-Orthodox leaders have long protested that monopoly.

The deal, a copy of which JTA obtained ahead of the cabinet vote, still contains a few unknowns. It is unclear how long construction will take. It does not say whether clear signage will direct visitors to the non-Orthodox section. Nor does it say exactly when Women of the Wall, an embattled women's prayer group, will move its monthly services from the Orthodox Jewish main prayer section to the non-Orthodox one.

Still, the Conservative and Reform movements can declare victory. The size of the non-Orthodox section of the Western Wall will double to nearly 10,000 square feet – half the size of the Orthodox main section just to its north. A committee of non-Orthodox leaders and government officials will manage the non-Orthodox section. And a single entrance will lead to both sections.

The Western Wall's haredi Orthodox management, called the Western Wall Heritage Foundation, also safeguarded its interests. Non-Orthodox leaders had campaigned for a share of control of the Orthodox section of the wall, but the Heritage Foundation will retain full authority over it and the larger plaza behind the prayer sections. And when the plan is implemented, Women of the Wall will move to the non-Orthodox section, one of the Heritage Foundation's long-standing demands.

"They all came to the conclusion that they must make serious compromises because they want it to remain one Kotel for one people," Jewish Agency for Israel Chairman Natan Sharansky told JTA. "It's the place that must unite us more than anything else, and it turned into the most ugly war."

Plans for the non-Orthodox section's expansion, spearheaded by Sharansky, began in December 2012. In October of that year, police had arrested the Women of the Wall's chairwoman, Anat Hoffman, for wearing a tallit during the group's monthly service – an act that at the time was illegal at the site.

Talks on a plan to expand the non-Orthodox section of the wall, located in an archeological park known as Robinson's Arch, began in April 2013. Sharansky and outgoing Israeli cabinet secretary Avichai Mandelblit led the negotiations, which included representatives of the Reform and Conservative movements, the Heritage Foundation and Women of the Wall.

Nearly three years later, the deal enacted last Sunday calls for the creation of an "official and respected," 9,700-square foot prayer space in the non-Orthodox section of the Western Wall, running along a 31-foot segment of the wall, that Sharansky said will fit approximately 1,200 people. It will have a government-funded staff, Torah scrolls and other ritual objects, and be open to all forms of Jewish prayer. Sharansky estimated its construction could take up to two years.

Even after it is completed, the non-Orthodox section will remain smaller than its Orthodox counterpart. The Orthodox section measures some 21,500 square feet, adjacent to a nearly 200-foot segment of the wall, and has some 27,000 visitors on an average day.

The area is divided into two sections: a larger one for men and a smaller one for women. The rules prohibit women from reading from Torah scrolls in the Orthodox section.

A committee composed of two Reform leaders, two Conservative leaders, two non-Orthodox women representatives, the Jewish Agency chairman and six government officials will run the non-Orthodox section.

The Orthodox and non-Orthodox sections of the Western Wall will share an entrance near the Old City of Jerusalem's Dung Gate, one story above the Western Wall plaza's current entrance. Currently, the path to the non-Orthodox section is long, narrow and accessible only through a gateway tucked in a back corner of the plaza. The deal will create a wide and visible walkway to the section.

The deal does not specify, however, whether there will be signs at the entrance informing visitors of the non-Orthodox section or anything else notifying visitors of its existence.

"The vision of the new section of the Kotel is a physical and conceptual space open to all forms of Jewish prayer," a statement from Women of the Wall read. "Instead of splitting up the existing pie into ever more divided, smaller pieces, we are making the pie much larger and sharing the new space."

The Western Wall's haredi management, headed by Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz, has long pushed for Women of the Wall to leave the site. Under the deal, the women's group has agreed to move to the non-Orthodox section only once the deal is implemented. And a faction of Women of the Wall has vowed not to budge from the Orthodox section – regardless of what the deal says.

The Western Wall's religious status has been under contention for decades. Women of the Wall was founded in 1988 to advance women's prayer at the site, which is prohibited under haredi Orthodox Jewish law. Until 2013, much of the group's activity contravened the Heritage Foundation's regulations and thus was illegal. Police regularly detained members of the group.

Non-Orthodox groups also suffered persecution at the site. In 1997, an egalitarian Conservative Shavuot celebration behind the prayer section was attacked by protesters throwing bottles, diapers and refuse at the worshippers. The incident led to the establishment of the non-Orthodox prayer section at Robinson's Arch in 2000.

Following an international backlash to Hoffman's 2012 arrest, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu tasked Sharansky with forging a compromise solution to the dispute. An outline Sharansky proposed in April 2013 called for the non-Orthodox section to be equal in size and elevation to the Orthodox section, but it proved unworkable due to objections from the Israel Antiquities Authority and the Waqf, the Islamic body that governs the Temple Mount.

In August 2013, Diaspora Affairs Minister Naftali Bennett tried for an interim solution by building a 4,800 square-foot platform that created more space in the non-Orthodox section. Women of the Wall rejected the platform, calling it a "sundeck." Now the architects of Sunday's compromise hope that all sides of the debate will be able to put their differences behind them for the sake of the Western Wall's symbolism.

"This contains the hope that the Western Wall will no longer be an arena for disputes, and will regain the uniting character that befits its special place for the entire Jewish people," the agreement reads. "May this also bring peace among us." ■

If the U.S. can decrypt vital Israeli transmissions – who else can?

Judah Ari Gross
JERUSALEM

News that the United States and the United Kingdom have for years been tapping into the encrypted communications of Israel Air Force drones and fighter jets sent shock waves through Israel on Jan. 29, with the story dominating the front pages of the country's newspapers.

But America and Britain are Israel's allies.

And while it's never pleasant to learn that your friends are spying on you, the breach – considered by one official to be "the worst leak in the history of Israeli intelligence" – did not necessarily damage Israel's security.

The deeper concern is that Israel's numerous enemies, and not its allies, have also been able, or will be able, to hack into Israeli systems and decrypt Israeli cybernetic systems, which are of growing importance to civilians and militaries alike.

The breach re-emphasizes that possibility.

And the very nature of the revelations underlines another profound concern for Israeli intelligence: The Intercept's article detailing the 18-year breach of air force encryptions is based on information leaked by Edward Snowden. If the U.S. National Security Agency has its hands on Israeli intelligence, and the United States is hacked or has information leaked, all that top secret Israeli intel gets exposed as well.

According to the bombshell revelations last Friday, the Americans and British long ago intercepted and decoded in real time encrypted broadcasts between Israeli drones and F-16s, and the ground.

"This is an earthquake," a senior security source – who spoke on condition of anonymity – told the Ynet website. "It means that they have forcibly stripped us, and, no less important, that probably none of our encrypted systems are safe from them."

By monitoring the feeds from drones and planes, the American National Security Agency (NSA) and British Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) could track Israeli actions in the Gaza Strip and West Bank, and also determine if Israel was gearing up to launch any attacks against Iran or other targets.

'We're seeing a tight relationship between the kinetic and the cybernetic.'

Needless to say, such information would also be of interest to Iran itself, Hamas and Hezbollah, all of which the Israel Defence Force (IDF) knows are working tirelessly to break into Israeli systems and decrypt Israeli operational communications.

"We know that the nations around us are putting a lot of effort into obtaining cyber capabilities," Oron Mincha, spokesperson for the IDF's C4I Telecommunications Corps, told journalists in December in a conversation at the Corps' base in Tzrifin, outside of Tel Aviv.

"When a country deals with the proliferation of rockets, we're not surprised to see that they are also using the cyber tools to help our enemies," the officer said, not saying the name of a country, but clearly implying Iran.

"We're seeing a tight relationship between the kinetic and the cybernetic," he said.

This breach was not the first time that foreign bodies intercepted Israeli drone feeds; indeed, Hezbollah is known to have done so, with fatal consequences. In 1997, Hezbollah managed to capture the (non-encrypted) feed from an Israeli drone and used the information to plan an ambush against members of the IDF's elite Shayetet 13 naval unit, killing 12 of them.

Such vulnerability is an inherent problem with wireless communication, one that advanced militaries have been facing for decades, as they seek to communicate across vast distances without having their messages plucked out of the air.

A remote-controlled drone with a camera attached to it makes it possible to photograph from the air. MOSHE SHAI/FLASH90 PHOTO

After the 1997 incident, known in Hebrew as the "Shayetet catastrophe," Israel began encrypting its communications – plainly, however, not to the extent necessary, as evident by the 18-year period over which the United States and England have been able to decrypt those transmissions.

"The challenge with using drones is how you manage your spectrum security," Mincha said.

Speaking in December, Mincha boasted that Israel was "pretty good" about cyber security, though he admitted that there are things that "keep my boss up at night."

"The IDF" – he knocked on the wooden lectern – "so far is maintaining the high level of defence capabilities, due to the manufacturing of homemade tools to defend our system," Mincha said.

Last Friday's revelations clearly undermine that confident assessment.

To try to ensure the secrecy of its drone feeds, the IDF has manufactured its own systems to protect the UAV's communication channels in-house; these measures are evidently vulnerable.

Though drones and their wireless communications capabilities are complex and expensive, the technology needed to break into them is surprisingly cheap and accessible.

In 2009, the United States experienced this first hand, when U.S. Forces discovered that they were the victims of a similar kind of cyber attack to the ones the NSA has been committing against Israel.

Iraqi insurgents, using store-bought equipment and a commercial computer program, were able to tap into the video feeds of Predator drones, which were not encrypted at the time, and monitor them.

"Anybody can go to a store and buy equipment for $10,000 that can mimic our capability," Robert Elder, a retired U.S. Air Force lieutenant general, told Wired magazine in 2014.

Because Israel uses encrypted transmissions, the NSA and GCHQ had to invest significantly more computing power than the Iraqi insurgents, according to The Intercept.

It was not immediately clear from Friday's reports if the United States and Britain are still capable of monitoring Israeli drone feeds, and the IDF would not officially comment whether news of this breach will prompt a response or change in policy for the air force.

Energy Minister Yuval Steinitz claimed Israel was "disappointed" but not "surprised" by the intel breach. Which begs the question: If, as Steinitz said, Israel assumes that the United States spies on it, why does it not take more sophisticated measures to protect its communications? ■

New Israeli dads to get eight days of parental leave

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Fathers in Israel will soon be eligible for eight days of paternity leave, if a bill green-lighted by a ministerial panel Sunday becomes law.

The leave, to run parallel to that granted to mothers, will comprise five days on the account of the father's sick-pay allocation, plus another three at his own cost.

Since May 1998, fathers have been allowed to take paternity leave instead of – rather than in addition to – their wives, as well as one day of leave when the baby is born and a second day for a circumcision if the baby is a boy.

The OK from the Ministerial Committee for Legislation means it will now receive government backing. The legislation must still go through other committees and pass three Knesset votes before becoming a law.

"The bill is an important step and a breakthrough in approach to parental equality," said MK Eli Alalouf (Kulanu), promising to shepherd the legislation through the Labour, Welfare and Health Committee he chairs.

Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel (Jewish Home) said fathers deserved to be with their babies after birth, while women deserved to have their partners by their side.

Recently, the Economy Ministry came out in opposition to the bill, saying that while it supported the principle of the legislation, the practice would hurt small businesses because it would be difficult for workers to find replacements for eight days. If the state wanted it, the state should pay, the ministry said, according to Channel 2 news.

By the time Sunday's vote came around, agreement had been reached between the sides.

In December 2015, the Knesset approved the preliminary reading of a separate bill, proposed by Kulanu party MK Rachel Azaria, to change "nursing hour" – which allows women to take off one hour from the working day during the first four months after returning from maternity leave – to "parenting hour," letting both parents use that time, if the mother of the child consents.

While fathers have been entitled – since 1998 – to replace their spouses during part of the maternity leave, most other post-natal allowances have applied only to women.

The bill notes, just 50 per cent of employable women are in the workforce, compared to 62.3 per cent of men; these women also have lower wages and work more in part-time employment. Furthermore, 26 per cent of women between the ages of 20-45 gave up their jobs after giving birth.

"The wage gap between women and men is a common phenomenon of childbirth and the associated absences have a direct impact on this, and as such require attention," the bill states. ■

Siblings create film about their pop-culture obsession

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Who wouldn't want their own talk show? Samantha and Jesse Herman may not see television superstardom in their future, but the pop-culture-obsessed sibling duo is bringing their quick wit to the big screen – and living rooms – in their new movie Let's Rap.

"We always thought, 'we're funny, right?' And we decided to finally put it down on paper," says Samantha.

Let's Rap is somewhat autobiographical and follows Bo (played by Brendan Gall) and Melanie Shnurr (Rachel Wilson), two down-on-their-luck 30-somethings.

They're, as Samantha says, "A brother and a sister who have no marketable talents other than their gift for pop cultural banter, so they decide the best thing for them to do is to try and get their own talk show."

Back in 2013, Samantha and Jesse released a Let's Rap short; they put out a feature-length version late in 2015.

The two, however, started writing their script in 2008 and got it up and running through production company Landed Entertainment. Samantha, who is four years older than Jesse, works as producer and as the firm's general counsel.

And while Jesse and Samantha's on-screen personas may come across as slackers, both siblings work as lawyers, in Los Angeles and Hamilton, Ont. respectively.

They, however, grew up in Toronto and set their movie squarely in this city. The cast, directed by Neil Huber, is filled with local talent, including Gall and Wilson along with Randal Edwards, Peter MacNeill and Kristian Bruun of Orphan Black fame.

Canadian Jason Priestly also makes a cameo. Samantha describes his appearance as a dream come true. "I can die now and I'd be good," she jokes.

Though Priestly wasn't the Hermans' only coup. So far, Let's Rap screened at the Toronto Independent Film Festival and it'll be making its way to FilmFest DC, the Washington DC International Film Festival, this spring.

Thanks to an Indiegogo crowd-funding campaign, Samantha and Jesse raised more than $30,000 for their project. They also secured private investors and Ottawa-based brewery Beau's jumped on board as a beer sponsor. "Beau's beer for Bo," says Samantha with a laugh. "It's in a lot of scenes, it's almost a drinking game."

> We always thought 'we're funny, right?' And we decided to put it down on paper.
> Samantha Herman

And indeed the on-screen siblings do drink a lot of Beau's Lug Tread beer, especially when they challenge each other to a round of mental Battleship. It's one of the many complicated, no-board board games Samantha and Jesse actually play in real life.

With fast-paced dialogue, plenty of references to television shows and movies – like Game of Thrones and the 1994 Keanu Reeves movie Speed – and two romantic storylines, Let's Rap is a feel-good comedy. But Jesse notes that much of it is based in reality.

That means, of course, the main characters are Jewish. "Our humour is Jewish humour," says Jesse. "That's what we grew up on, so that was important for us to keep."

The cinematic siblings are also incredibly close. And in reality, Jesse and Samantha are completely in-sync when script-writing together.

"We never fought during the actual production," says Samantha. "We only fight about non-movie stuff."

Let's Rap is distributed by the Toronto company 108 Media. It's currently available on iTunes, Amazon, Google, Vudu, Xbox and Vimeo. ■

German author pens a gripping detective novel

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There are many reasons to be impressed with The Ice Queen, the third crime detective novel by German author Nele Neuhaus to be translated into English.

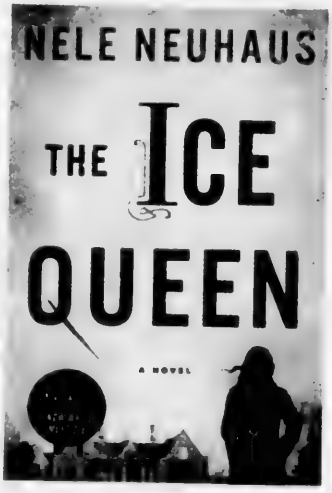
First, it is an intriguing mystery that pulls you into its labyrinthine story in its first three pages. Something is amiss right away. The perceptive reader will twig to casually adduced, seemingly benign, offhand references that grate just a little bit. Are they clues for larger developments later in the narrative, we are left to wonder? Perhaps.

The promotional material on the book's jacket cover sets the scene for the prospective reader: wealthy, elderly Holocaust survivor David Yossi Goldberg is found murdered in his home near Frankfurt. A five-digit number is smeared at the murder scene in the victim's blood. Shockingly, the autopsy on Goldberg's body discloses an old, partially visible, but unmistakable tattoo on his arm. This tattoo is an identifier of an individual's blood type etched into the inside of the arm of each member of the Nazi SS. Before any further forensic examinations can be conducted upon Goldberg's body, his family, accompanied by American and German government officials, swoops into the scene to remove the corpse.

Two other murders of seniors quickly follow. And in each case, the same five-digit number is daubed at the crime scene in the victim's blood.

That is the beginning of the tangled skein of undecipherable signs, disturbing developments and sometimes very subtle clues that must be unravelled to solve the murders.

Neuhaus is an experienced author. She has deftly constructed an intricately layered narrative that leads the reader to the story's final dramatic conclusion through a carefully manicured maze of conundrum and clue. All of the action occurs within a two-week period, and this compacted time frame helps establish an atmosphere of urgency and pressure.



The Ice Queen
by Nele Neuhaus,

Minotaur Books 2009
English translation 2014
by Steven T. Murray

Neuhaus is widely read in Germany, where more than four million copies of her books are currently in print. The Ice Queen follows her crime mysteries Snow White Must Die and Bad Wolf, which have now been translated into English. These books feature her two notable investigative characters, Oliver Von Bodenstein and Pia Kirchoff.

This leads to the second noteworthy aspect of The Ice Queen. Neuhaus' detectives are very well developed characters, which is not necessarily the norm for murder crime mysteries. Though von Bodenstein and Kirchoff are the police "heroes" of the story, by no means are they heroic in the familiar sense of the term. Neither displays particularly extraordinary traits or qualities. They are entirely "ordinary" human beings, emotionally resilient and responsive at some times, emotionally vulnerable and distant at others. Neither possesses that one great, defining skill or brilliance that leads – as we have so often seen in Hollywood finishes – to the climactic life-saving rescue. Instead, they are like anyone else plugging away at their work, despite headaches or hangovers or personal trauma at home. The one key difference, however, between their work and the work of most of the rest of us is that theirs leads them into the darkest corners of the world, and they travel mostly in the soul-shattering gutters and other low echelons of human nature.

Like the good detectives they are intended to be, von Bodenstein and Kirchoff constantly hover in the margins of the action, observing, noting, questioning and concluding. They attempt to control the investigation, but they know, in truth, that the constant unfolding of events actually controls them.

The detectives, however, are not the dominant characters in the story. The dominant characters are the individuals affiliated – as family, friends and acquaintances – with a prominent family within German industry, stalwart philanthropists, societal elites whose connections reach across continents. They are the individuals who comprise the large circle of players who stir the story's many mysteries and orchestrate its multiple murders, the core suspects in the murders and assorted other miscreants.

But darkly kept secrets and deceptions lie hidden deep within the centre of the circle. They have been assiduously interwoven over the years into a mesh that ultimately entraps and destroys all who become caught in its menace and pathology.

And this is the third compelling aspect of the work. The essence of The Ice Queen is the author's reflection upon the profoundly corrupting, corrosive and self-destructive effect of holding onto and constructing an entire life and personal history based upon a foundation of malevolent intrigue and dark, evil secrets. In the case of The Ice Queen, those guarded falsehoods reach back into the sinister days of the Third Reich.

For this reader, that was the fourth and most gripping aspect of the book. The story is a personal confrontation by a German author born after World War II with the hideous cruelties wrought by her countrymen fewer than three decades before she was born in 1967. The book examines, with considerable conscience and narrative flair, the unspeakable suffering brought upon the world by the Nazis. It also explores the devastation wrought upon Germans opposed to Nazis.

The Ice Queen powerfully depicts human devastation and suffering in its microcosmic form. The grotesque brutality perpetrated by the Nazis on an entire continent, on their own country, on countless suffering peoples – especially, of course, the Jewish People – can most truly be grasped in the cruelty perpetrated upon specific individuals and their families.

In The Ice Queen, Nele Neuhaus artfully reminds us that the flame that burns deep within the soul seeking justice, seeking to calm an anguish that echoes from a far-away scarred past, cannot be extinguished by deception and guile. Eventually, a house of evil collapses onto itself, toppled by the unbearable weight of its horrific sins. ■

Leizer and Chaimie get Trumped

Chaimie and Leizer

The following is an actual iMessage conversation between Chaimie and Leizer as recorded in the month of January 2016. Reader discretion is advised.

Leizer: Hey Chaimie, how do you like Trump's "schlonged" comment re: Hillary? He's one of us, I told you!
Chaimie: Hey Leizy, I suppose he is, if you mean he's an anti-Semite :(
Leizer: Are you jk?... One of his comments was that he wants the people counting his money to wear those beanies on their heads. What greater honour could there be?
Chaimie: Gee, I dunno – maybe electing the first Jewish American president, as opposed to a New Yorker who enjoys helping with the continued massacre of the Yiddish language?
Leizer: Massacre? You're totally getrumped... See, even his NAME is Yiddish... Schlong is clearly a German snake (or is that Merkel?)
Chaimie: BITE my German snake. You're joking, right? You're not actually into this guy? At a campaign fundraiser for N.Y. Jews, he referred to us as "You people," with barely veiled references to "us" being "good negotiators"... Now, don't get me wrong here – we are good – the best! – but HE can't say that!
Leizer: But that's his beauty. He speaks what's on his mind. He's fearless. He's like Jesus, if Jesus were the opposite of Jesus in every other capacity... Look, you know the old presidential test of who would you rather sit down for a beer with. Who would you rather sit down with for smoked meat? Of course it's Trump!... Bernie might be vegan for all we know (And meanwhile Hillary has a "ham" in her maiden name). Face it: Trump is going to make Yiddish great again!
Chaimie: You know who IS like Jesus? Bernie farkakten Sanders, the socialist, the Shalom Achshavnik, the defender of the poor, who CLEARLY doesn't give a shoyt about "appearances," his hair or otherwise. He's a kibbutznik, for Chrissake! And you're pro-Donald, Shallow Be His Name. Typical you.
Leizer: Would you put a kibbutznik in charge of a country? Breakfast, maybe, but that's it.
Chaimie: Look, I admit their not known for their cuisine, but they built Israel up from nothing, and that's what America needs right now, a builder. Not a gambler (who's own casinos go broke)...

Make that *they're and *whose
Leizer: (It's OK – you don't need to correct anything. In the world of Trump, nothing you write or say ever needs to get corrected. It's a mechayeh!)... Look, I think you've been spending too much time getting "gefiltered" at Phish concerts, Bern-ing a few too many in a Green Mountain state on one of your usual "cross-border shopping" trips and you've lost touch with your roots. The Donald, who, by the way, I now prefer to call The Dovid – full name, Dovid Trompldik – may not be perfect, he may not be nice, he may not even be a good businessman, but since we're hip to go back to trends like beards and mutton chops, why can't we go back to political incorrectness and infantile "my dad will beat up your dad" talk? Also, do you SEE the way he repeatedly repeats the word China? It's like he's a shmatte maven, cursing them out.
Chaimie: I can see how you appreciate him as the more "Judaic" candidate (albeit not the more Jewish), as he is a classic misogynist and xenophobe, like most of the ancient Israelites.
Leizer: There you go again, epikoiris! When the Dovid has spoken, there will be a registry of anti-Semites like you. And your name will be in capital letters.
Chaimie: Baruch hashish.
Leizer: What?
Chaimie: Ducking autocorrect.
Leizer: Ducking indeed.
Chaimie: Gey duckin' in yam. ■

Fall Into Love at Valentine's Day concert

RUTH SCHWEITZER

Mitch Smolkin will sing songs of love on Feb. 14. Pictured at right is singer Amanda Martinez JOHNNY LOPERA PHOTO

> To be able to love takes tremendous courage.
> Mitch Smolkin

Looking for the perfect gift for Valentine's Day? Or maybe you want to make a reservation at a high-end Toronto restaurant, book a romantic winter getaway or even learn how to survive the day if you're single.

There's no shortage of ideas online, along with tips for avoiding stress and disappointment the next day. Apparently, people who put a lot of pressure on themselves and their partners to make Valentine's Day special can end up feeling disappointed when the reality falls short of their expectations.

Mitch Smolkin, a well-known local singer who, somewhat surprisingly, is also a certified couples therapist, said the cliché about holidays, including Valentine's Day, being a source of stress is true. Valentine's Day "should ostensibly be a time when you're focusing on the relationship. That certainly can be the positive effect. But if the intimate bond between the couple is not healthy, the stress of a holiday can highlight that," he said.

Smolkin suggested planning low-key activities that will make your partner comfortable. That could include going to his Valentine's Day concert, Fall Into Love, at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts to hear some of the most beautiful love songs ever written.

But you won't necessarily have to be in the company of a romantic partner to enjoy the show. "Music on a biological level taps into the part of our brain that is responsible for emotions. We hear a song and we're moved or taken back 30 years," Smolkin said.

The concert opens with a song about falling. To quote the show's webpage, "Falling is about being vulnerable, letting go and allowing your heart to lead the way."

Smolkin said there's a "part of ourselves, no matter how tightly we hold ourselves, that is always extremely vulnerable. To be able to love takes tremendous courage. Falling and being vulnerable is one of the scariest things to do in one's life."

Love songs have been around for centuries. The oldest one is thought to be The Love Song for Shu-Sin, written circa 2000 BCE in ancient Mesopotamia. One of several love songs composed for King Shu-Sin, it speaks of a close and personal relationship with the goddess of love.

On the popularity of love songs, Smolkin said we need attachments from the cradle to the grave. When we feel hopeless, when we fall and when we take risks, having someone next to us keeps us stable and helps us get through it, he added.

"In writing about love, it's a way to express a powerful emotion," he said. "I think it also betrays the fact that we desperately want to connect and to love and to feel safe."

The former artistic director of the Ashkenaz Festival, Smolkin has performed around the world as a Yiddish singer. He wanted to learn some new repertoire, including songs in English, and the Valentine's Day concert snowballed from there.

"I love that I'm investing more in my music because training as a therapist really took over a great deal of my time, and I felt I didn't have the time to hit the pavement and tour," he said. He added that he's also a little daunted by this relaunch of his music career and "scared to death to take that leap again, both for practical reasons and probably because it's a gamble."

Along with Smolkin, the show features singers Gabi Epstein, Amanda Martinez and David Dunbar. They'll be performing songs in five languages, including French ballads of Charles Aznavour, love songs of The Beatles, melodies of Broadway, tunes from the Great American Songbook, Yiddish ballads and Hebrew spirituals. Guitarist Levon Ichkhanian, pianist David Warrack, violinist Anna Atkinson and mandolinist Eric Stein accompany the singers. ■

Show re-imagines the songs of Leonard Cohen

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Chelsea Hotel: The Songs of Leonard Cohen is part cabaret, part theatre, a show about a poet suffering from writer's block who's visited by five singers, some of whom are former lovers.

"The show is a re-imagining of Leonard Cohen's music," said Brian Goldenberg, executive director of Theatre 20, adding the writer goes on a journey through songs of love and loss.

Arriving in Toronto in February direct from Edmonton's Citadel Theatre, Chelsea Hotel is presented by Theatre 20 and Theatre Passe Muraille. Chelsea Hotel has played to sold-out audiences across Western Canada since 2012.

The show is loosely set in the infamous Chelsea Hotel in New York, where Cohen lived for a time in the 1960s and whose guests once ranged from Mark Twain to the punk rocker Sid Vicious. The title also refers to one of Cohen's well-known songs.

When introducing Chelsea Hotel in concert, Cohen used to tell a story about meeting a famous singer in an elevator at the Chelsea, which led to the sexual encounter he describes in the song.

A celebration of Cohen's music, the show features 26 of his songs. The cast of six plays 17 instruments, some of which you wouldn't expect to hear on his songs. "You may hear ukulele and cello in Suzanne; accordion, guitar and violin in Take This Waltz; accordion in Joan of Arc; banjolele in No Way to Say Goodbye and ukulele and guitar in Lover, Lover, Lover," said Tracey Power, who developed Chelsea Hotel.

"It's the arrangements themselves that I think bring a new sound to some of the songs."

In Famous Blue Raincoat, the instruments and voices have been arranged to reflect raindrops. Power asked her musical arranger, Steve Charles, to create a sound for the world of the show that was circus-like at times and highly imaginative. It embraces the element of surprise and allows an audience to hear well-known songs again for the first time, Power said in an email.

"This world would also allow audience members not as familiar with Cohen to be included and not feel like they were on the outside of a world so well known to others."

Surprisingly, Cohen's music was not the focus of the show in her original conception. "It started as a piece that was storytelling through purely movement and accordion music. Very much like what a silent film would look like," Power said. "I wondered what would happen if I took the same idea, but instead of accordion music, it was the music of Leonard Cohen. I never thought of any other artist. It was the poetic nature of his lyrics that inspired imagination and creativity and through his music could be beautifully interpreted on stage."

She added that the show's dance element supports the songs, like backup singers or dancers in a band. "I've expanded on that idea and used it to express emotions, action and to keep the show flowing and moving continuously from one song to the next."

The cast includes Rachel Aberle, Sean Cronin, Christina Cuglietta, Benjamin Elliot, Jonathan Gould and Power, who also directs the show. ■

Winnipeg playwright wins Jewish writing competition

ALAN ZEITLIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, NEW YORK

Once the fire started, the 123 mostly Jewish and Italian young women had virtually no chance to survive. Doors were locked to prevent stealing, an elevator only held 12 people at a time and the flimsy fire escapes collapsed. Some jumped to their deaths and 23 men died as well. The Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire of 1911, in Manhattan, was one of the most harrowing horrors of American history.

Playwright Alix Sobler made this the subject of her play The Great Divide and on Jan. 25 was named the winner of the 2015 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition for it. Sobler received a $1,000 prize and a public reading of this work will take place at Montreal's Segal Centre for Performing Arts on Feb. 16.

In addition, her play The Secret Annex which imagines Anne Frank's life if she survived the Holocaust, opens Jan. 31 at the Segal Centre. Its first run was in 2014 at the Royal Manitoba Theatre Centre.

As she ate a salad and prepared for a rehearsal for The Glass Piano that will open at Columbia University on Feb. 12, she spoke about winning the award and what drives her writing.

"To get noticed in that way is such an honour," she said. "I worry sometimes that people will be less interested in stories from the past, but every once in a while, you are reassured that people recognize the relevance today."

She said her writing is informed by her feminism, her Jewish upbringing and her study of the labour movement.

"It just felt like we learned this lesson over 100 years ago and yet still workers are facing those challenges," she said. "The immigrants who worked in the factories in those days were as far away from the people who bought those clothes as we are from the women and men who work in Indonesia and Taiwan who are making our clothes now."

Alix Sobler, winner of the 2015 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition

Her script shows the women making clothes being overworked and underpaid. But even in an environment like this, one character, Rosa Friedman, finds love. Anne Frank also falls in love in The Secret Annex.

Sobler is getting her MFA in playwriting from Columbia University. Born in New York, she now splits her time between New York and Winnipeg.

Sobler said unique depictions of women are needed. "Not just Jewish plays, but for plays in general, we like our heroines of history to be young, pretty and dead," she said. "What does it mean when a woman is alive and older than when we remember her but tries to tell her own story? Would we have cared what Anne had to say had she survived?"

> Not just Jewish plays, but for plays in general, we like our heroines of history to be young, pretty and dead.

She recalled how in 2014, Justin Bieber caused a stir when he visited the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam.

Sobler, who is in her 30s, said the criticism was unfounded and believes Anne would have been a fan of Bieber.

"Anne Frank was obsessed with pop culture stars of the time and I think she probably would have been a 'Belieber,'" Sobler said. "I was impressed he went. When you're in the media like that, people are really hard on you and they pick on you a lot."

Sobler, whose writing is peppered with comedic elements, said she trusts her audiences.

"I don't preach to people," she said. "I don't claim to have anything figured out. Do I hope that my writing can inspire social change? Sure, but really, I encourage investigation."

Sobler's real-life love story was theatrical. While doing improv at The Fringe Festival, she met an actor at Lydia's Pub in Saskatoon.

"He was adorable," she said, dropping her fork in her bowl. "It was love at first sight."

She moved from a New York suburb to Winnipeg in 2005.

While the bar she met her husband at on Broadway Avenue in Saskatoon is now closed, she hopes to eventually open a play on Broadway in Manhattan.

"Someday," she said with a smile. "I like to dream big." ■

Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto seeks home for its books

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The future of an important Toronto-based Jewish library collection is up in the air as the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto (JGST) seeks a new home for its specialized collection of roughly 500 books and 45 periodicals.

The non-circulating collection has been housed since 1989 in the sixth-floor Canadiana room of the North York Central Library on Yonge Street, a branch of the Toronto Public Library system, where it has been accessible to patrons on an in-house, reference basis only. Although the Canadiana room has for decades been dedicated to genealogical research, the library recently announced it is "repurposing" the room, with renovation slated to begin in April or May.

Although the Toronto Reference Library has offered to take some of the JGST collection, it wants only select, non-duplicated items, which would be integrated into its present holdings, and has no interest in preserving the integrity of the JGST library as a specifically Jewish collection.

"We'd prefer to have a home for our library that would keep the entire collection intact, a place where our members and the public would have access to the collection," said Elaine Cheskes, the JGST's acting librarian. She has contacted numerous community centres, synagogue libraries, universities and other public institutions seeking a new home for the collection, but so far has found no takers.

According to Cheskes, the society also considered putting the library into storage, as was done with the former Toronto Jewish Public Library when it closed its doors in the Lipa Green Centre building some years ago.

"It's an expensive proposition, and we don't have the money," she said. "The Jewish Public Library has been in storage for eight years. We don't want that to happen to us. It's almost better to donate the collection and let the public have access to the books, rather than lock them up in a storage space."

The JGST collection includes many volumes of local Jewish family history, Who's Who guides to Canadian Jews, how-to guides to doing research, titles on Jewish surnames, numerous Yizkor books and Holocaust titles, and items related to Jewish communities across Canada, the United States, Europe, Russia, Belarus, Lithuania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, South Africa and elsewhere in the Jewish Diaspora.

Both Cheskes and JGST outgoing president Les Kelman concur that until an organization or private or corporate benefactor emerges with a rescue plan, the society's options are limited to the proposal from the Toronto Public Library, which would effectively mean the dissolution of the JGST library.

"We'd lose all control, all ownership, but at least the books would still be available to the public," Kelman said. "All credit to them. They're really trying to offer us an alternative, but it's just not our first choice." ■

Thoughts on grandparenting

Lauren Kramer

A few years ago, I was asked to write a story about grandparenting and was supplied with a list of names of suitable grandparents whose input I was to solicit. The story was about the difference between loving indulgence and spoiling your grandchildren. How much did these grandparents value time spent with their grandchildren, and how did they spend that time?

One, an investment adviser, had taken his entire family to Israel in honour of his granddaughter's bat mitzvah. "It was an incredible trip, worth every penny we spent," he said. Now that she was grown, he and his wife would frequently take her out for dinner to chat about her career and accomplishments.

Another described the special trips he and his wife had taken with each of their grandkids for their respective bar and bat mitzvahs – to Alaska, London and on a cruise. "They were wonderful experiences that the three of us could share just among ourselves," he recalled.

Their responses had a lasting impact on me, as they set an extraordinarily high bar for grandparent-grandchildren interactions. They compelled me to reflect on the kind of grandparents I'd known and the kind I want to be someday when my own kids are grown.

It strikes me that there's a definite balance between the boundaries of grandparenting versus daily child care, and it's one that divides grandparents into two distinct camps. There are those who gladly assume child-care responsibilities, stepping in to look after their grandkids when their children are working or having fun. As child-care providers, they prepare meals, shuffle their grandkids to friends and activities, and double-up as parents when the kids' mothers or fathers aren't able or willing to fill the role.

Then there are others who fiercely protect the recreational space in their own lives and are willing to spend time with their grandkids, but only on their own terms. That might mean a sleepover when it's convenient, an excursion to the toy store to select a gift on birthdays, and an occasional shared meal. But it doesn't include any of the drudgery of daily child care – no dealing with tantrums, no discipline, no trying to reason with an overtired toddler that he or she needs to eat/bathe/rest. "Been there, done that with my own kids," is their mantra. "Not willing to do all that again."

My parents used to grumble about my grandma when I was a child. "She spends no money on the kids," I overheard my dad complain. "I wish she would spoil them more."

It was true: there weren't many material gifts coming our way from our Gran, but when it came to time and interest in her grandchildren, she put in the hours. She'd listen as I played the piano, offer support as I studied for exams and welcome me for sleepovers when my parents and I weren't seeing eye to eye.

Hers was my little sanctuary-away-from-home at times, and those memories are so strong that on a recent visit back to the city where she'd taken her last breath 19 years ago, I knocked on the door of her old home and asked to enter, just to be in that space one more time. Just in case I could still feel something of her within its walls.

I know I want to be close with my grandkids one day, but the question I ponder is, how close? Will I be the grandma that performs night-nurse duty when the grandkids are infants so my own daughters can get their beauty sleep? Will I be the one accepting Friday night invitations and arriving with flowers and an empty stomach, or will I host the whole family? Will I babysit gladly on a Saturday night, or will I decline in favour of a night out myself? It's hard to anticipate how forthcoming I'll be when the time comes.

This much I know: I'll not want my kids to take advantage of my time. There will be a tipping point between their child-care needs and my willingness to help raise their kids. I just hope that balance is a fair and respected one, and that my future sons- and daughters-in-law won't get out the knives each time I leave the room. ■

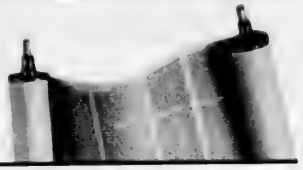
Mishpatim | Exodus 21:1-24:18



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier finds a connection between grand revelation and our day-to-day lives
Rabbi Denise Handlarski reflects on kashrut laws and asks: 'What does it mean to eat Jewishly?'
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen sees the kippah as a reminder that someone is always watching over us

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

At the end of last week's parshah, we concluded on a spiritual high with the revelation at Mount Sinai. God promised that we will be a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exodus 19:6). The Ten Commandments paint a picture of an ideal world, and the experience of hearing and seeing God seems to present a spiritual ideal.

This week, as we read Mishpatim, we are brought down from the intense experience of Sinai. We are reminded that the real world requires a slightly different focus than we had when we contemplated the depths of peoplehood, mission and Torah.

Mishpatim is full of detailed laws – laws about how to treat others, laws to deal with theft and manslaughter, laws about a fair justice system and laws on how to serve God. The laws in Mishpatim help us navigate relationships with others.

However, even in the mundane world of interpersonal laws, the concept of holiness emerges. Situated in Parshat Mishpatim is the verse: "You shall be holy people to me" (Exodus 22:30). While it's possible that this verse refers to the food we ingest (mentioned in the same verse), the word "holy" connects our everyday laws with the grand revelation.

The Kotzker Rebbe taught that the Torah is teaching us to be holy in a human way when dealing with the temptations of normal people. He wrote that God already has enough angels. The Torah teaches us how to be holy humans.

Mishpatim teaches that when we treat people properly, when we have just courts and when we avoid bad behaviour, we can achieve holiness. Our ideal is not necessarily the heights of Mount Sinai and trying to be physically close to God. Rather, our ideal is to achieve closeness to God by the holiness of our day-to-day interactions. ■

Food for thought: you are what you eat. As Jews, do we eat Jewishly? If so, what does that mean?

Food is the stuff of the quotidian: the every day rhythms of the day, and the necessities that allow us to do what we do. And yet food is much more than that. We can grow it, we can cook it, and we can feed our loved ones as a sign of our care-taking.

For Jews, food has always been part of the construction of our peoplehood and the expression of our shared identity. Mishpatim mentions the laws of kashrut, the dietary restrictions, in a slew of passages that detail laws to be followed and holidays to be celebrated. All of these highlight how the formation of the law led to the formation of a people. Eating in a specific way, ensuring that people eat with only those in their same group, was a very concrete way to create and keep the people as separate from others.

Many Jews today still maintain that they keep kosher because it reminds them of their Jewishness in the small and everyday decisions and actions around food. Of course, there are many of us Jews who do not keep kosher, for there are other markers of culture and peoplehood that may be more valuable or relevant to our own lives. Some of us also find that there are other measures for ethical eating, whether supporting local products, those that are fairly traded, environmentally sustainable, vegetarian, etc., that better serve our desire, our sense of Jewish responsibility, to lessen our impact and increase our good in the world.

However we choose to understand how the laws of kashrut impact us, may we all find nourishment, sustenance, and pleasure in our food and those with whom we share it. ■

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

In view of a recent call in France for Jews not to wear their kippah in public to prevent anti-Semitic attacks, it's important to discuss it further.

A kippah is a vital custom for men, which became part of Torah. It reminds us that someone is always watching over us.

"Yarmulke" is made up the words "yirah malka," fear of God, so when one wears it, one acquires the fear of God.

Jews have survived and thrived throughout history because we have stood out with pride, wearing our kippot on our heads, keeping our traditions and not giving up. If one is in real danger, one may wear a cap.

But by wearing a kippah, we are making a statement to ourselves and to the Jewish people. It's a statement of our commitment to Judaism and to the Jewish People. The world respects those who wear a kippah because they stand for something. We act as ambassadors for the Jewish People.

There's an amazing story that the mother of the Lubavitcher Rebbe told: They were on a train in Russia, escaping to a safer haven, and anti-Semitism was at an all-time high. Suddenly, the Rebbe took out his tallit and tfillin and began to pray. The Rebbe's mother was petrified and thought a pogrom would break out! But instead, the non-Jews near them formed a wall around the Rebbe, as if to protect him, until he finished his prayers!

It's easy to remember God in shul, but Jewish consciousness is meant to pervade all aspects of our lives, how we treat others, how we do business and how we look at the world 24-7.

That said, no matter what level of observance you're at, let's all wear our kippot with pride in public! For Jews to give up their kippah, would be like handing an easy victory to the terrorists. ■

Sweet alternatives to regular flour

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The baking aisle has never been so versatile as it is these days. Alternatives to regular wheat flour abound and there's plenty of choice among sweeteners. For those with gluten intolerances, there are premixed gluten free all-purpose flour blends as well as almond meal flour, quinoa flour, sorghum flour, brown rice flour, tapioca flour and potato starch. Instead of regular granulated sugar, you can select coconut sugar, low calorie sugar replacements, agave, honey, maple syrup, brown rice syrup or stevia.

Coconut oil chocolate chip cookies

Coconut oil and coconut sugar is all the rage nowadays due to its many health and nutrient properties (most especially related to its fatty acids which turn into ketones). Since it's solid at room temperature, like butter or margarine, it can be substituted in many baking items, even where creaming is required. It does have quite a strong flavour so expect some overtones of coconut in these scrumptious, soft on the inside, crisp on the edges cookies.

- ❑ 1 cup all-purpose flour
- ❑ 2/3 cup large flake rolled oats
- ❑ ½ tsp. baking powder
- ❑ ½ tsp. baking soda
- ❑ ¼ tsp. salt
- ❑ ½ cup coconut oil, at room temperature
- ❑ ¾ cup packed light brown sugar
- ❑ ¼ cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 1 large egg, at room temperature
- ❑ 1 tsp. pure vanilla
- ❑ 1 cup semisweet chocolate chips

Preheat the oven to 375. Line two cookie sheets with parchment paper; set aside.

Whisk together the flour, rolled oats, baking powder, baking soda and salt in a bowl; set aside.

In the bowl of a stand mixer fitted with the paddle, or using a hand-held mixer, beat the coconut oil for 1 minute. Beat in the sugars until the mixture is thoroughly combined, about 3 minutes. Scrape down the dough. Beat in the egg. Beat in the vanilla. Remove the bowl from the stand.

Using a wooden spoon, stir the flour mixture into the butter mixture, in two additions. Stir in the chocolate chips.

Form the cookie dough into balls, using about 2 tbsp of dough for each one. Place on the prepared cookie sheets, spacing them about 2 inches apart. You should be able to get about 12 balls on a regular-sized cookie sheet. Flatten slightly.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven until set and lightly browned around the edges, 8–9 minutes. Cool on the pan on a wire rack for 2 minutes. Transfer the cookies to a wire rack to cool completely. Repeat with the remaining cookie dough, cooling the pans slightly before adding unbaked cookie dough to it. (Cookies can be stored in an airtight container for up to 5 days). Makes about 2 dozen cookies.

Gluten-free chocolate cupcakes with chocolate fudge frosting

These moist, soft and deeply chocolate cupcakes come out with a somewhat craggy-looking top. I think it adds to their homemade authenticity. The batter is quite thick but the tops will round out during the baking process.

- ❑ ½ cup + 1 tbsp. sorghum flour
- ❑ ½ cup unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
- ❑ 1/3 cup brown rice flour
- ❑ ¼ cup potato starch
- ❑ 1 tsp. xantham gum
- ❑ ½ tsp. baking powder
- ❑ ½ tsp. baking soda
- ❑ ½ tsp. salt
- ❑ ¼ cup unsalted butter, softened
- ❑ ¾ cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 2 large eggs, at room temperature
- ❑ 1 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 1 cup sour cream or full fat yogurt

Icing:

- ❑ ½ cup unsalted butter, softened
- ❑ 2 cups gluten-free icing sugar
- ❑ ¼ cup whipping cream
- ❑ 2 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
- ❑ 4 oz. bittersweet chocolate, melted and slightly cooled

Preheat the oven to 375. Line a 12-cup muffin tin with cupcake liners. Lightly spray the cupcake liners with cooking spray. This will help the cupcakes come cleanly out of the liners once baked.

In a large bowl, whisk together the sorghum flour, cocoa powder, rice flour, potato starch, xanthan gum, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Set aside.

In the bowl of a stand mixer fitted with the paddle attachment, or using a hand-held mixer, beat the butter with the sugar, until well combined, about 2 minutes. It won't ever get light and fluffy since the ratio of butter to sugar is too small. One at a time, beat in the eggs, making sure the first is fully incorporated before adding the second. Scrape down the sides of the bowl. Beat in the vanilla and then the sour cream.

Using a wooden spoon, stir the dry ingredients into the butter mixture, making sure that no streaks of the dry mixture remain. Spoon the batter evenly among the 12 cupcakes liners.

Bake in the centre of the oven until the tops spring back when lightly pressed, 20 minutes. Cool the cupcakes in the pan on a wire rack for 20 minutes. Transfer to a wire rack to cool completely.

Icing: In the bowl of a stand mixer fitted with the paddle attachment, or using a hand-held mixer, beat the butter for 1 minute. Add ½ cup of the icing sugar and beat. Scrape down the sides of the bowl. Add 1 tbsp of the whipping cream and beat. Scrape down the sides of the bowl. Repeat until all of the icing sugar and the cream are beaten in. Beat in the vanilla and then the cocoa powder. Slowly beat in the melted chocolate.

Transfer the icing to a piping bag fitted with a pastry tip of your choice. Pipe the icing over each cupcake. Serve at room temperature. ■

Julian Falconer: seeking justice for Sammy Yatim

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Toronto lawyer Julian Falconer, who's spent his career representing families of people killed by police officers or while in custody, will be representing the mother and sister of Sammy Yatim, the 18-year-old killed by a police officer in a 2013 incident on a streetcar in which he brandished a switchblade, in a lawsuit the women are pursuing against former Toronto police chief (and current Liberal MP) Bill Blair, the Toronto Police Services Board, two unnamed police officers and Const. James Forcillo. The officer was found guilty last week of attempted murder for shooting Yatim six times after an initial volley of shots that saw him crumple to the ground.

Julian Falconer

Why have you chosen to devote your career to representing families who've had a member killed by a police officer?
In these situations, you'll have an officer who's either poorly trained or who shouldn't have in the first place been entrusted with key decisions. Then you have a person in emotional crisis who couldn't possibly respond to police commands. The claim, "I shot him because he didn't do what I told him" when someone is delusional and doesn't know where they are is absurd. These cases are, frankly, the worst and the saddest. I'm able, as part of my work, to explore the circumstances and bring them to light, show some respect for the memory of the deceased and give the family some comfort knowing that somebody's on their side.

Have your Jewish values or background contributed to your professional commitment to social justice?
Yes, very much so. I think there's a history among Jewish communities of enlightened, progressive consciousness around engagements with the state, and a history of compassion. I think if you stick with that and your root values, you have the opportunity to do good work.

What's your take on the verdict in the criminal case against Forcillo?
The verdict is nothing short of historic. This is the first time that a jury has returned a guilty verdict with respect to a police officer's use of force in Ontario's history.

Had you hoped Forcillo would be convicted of murder?
I don't see the criminal process that way, in terms of my own likes and dislikes. The mother of Sammy Yatim, Sahar Bahadi, expressed her gratitude to the jury for the fine work they did, as well as to the judge and prosecutors. A fair hearing was done. The important result is that this police officer is being held accountable for his conduct. The use of lethal force is obviously the most extreme act an officer can engage in, and too often, they're not held accountable.

When is the civil case you're preparing going to trial?
It's difficult to say, given the stage it's at right now. The civil process is characteristically quite slow.

Will the verdict in the criminal case against Const. James Forcillo impact proceedings or potential outcomes in the civil suit you're preparing?
The verdict just came out and will be going to sentencing, so I'm not going to get into how it impacts the civil matter. I'm reluctant to start talking about how a criminal conviction can or cannot support a lawsuit. This isn't the time to talk about that.

After the verdict, the head of the police union made a strong statement about pursuing justice for Forcillo, while Toronto Police Chief Mark Saunders has said the force will continue to train officers to reduce harm in cases involving civilians in crisis. How much appetite for change do you think there is in the Toronto police community with regard to use of force and dealing with people in crisis?
I think it's sad that the police union, far from appreciating the public mood on this issue, continues to use the "us versus them" approach – that you're either for or against the police. They're continuing the same old-school approach of mindlessly backing a player regardless of their conduct. I'm disappointed to hear very little respect, condolences or sympathy from them to the Yatim family. The current climate of public opinion is one in which there's far more insight into these issues. The public appreciates that they can be supportive of good police officers while calling out bad policing. The police union seems unable to appreciate those nuances.

What specific changes would you like to see happening?
Members of the public and good police officers should be working together to minimize bad policing. It's hard to do that in the kind of environment the police union sets up. The recommendations in the 2014 report produced by retired Supreme Court Justice Frank Iacobucci for former police chief Bill Blair, which dealt with police conduct in encounters with people in crisis, have yet to be substantially implemented, despite spin doctoring to the contrary.

The key recommendations about changing police culture haven't been implemented. It's clear that, unassisted, the Toronto Police Service is not going to fix itself.

Right now, officers are taught that the remotest risk to their safety can justify the use of lethal force. So if someone is holding any edged item – including a pencil or pen – an officer is entitled, if the person doesn't respond to police commands, to draw a weapon and use deadly force.

There needs to be a balance. Of course police officers do a tough job and should be able to go home safe to their families, but there's got to be more balance so that their respect for the sanctity of the life they're dealing with doesn't come as a distant second to that.

Do you see hope for renewed change regarding police culture in Canada under the new Liberal government?
I look at things like the 2010 G20 Summit in Toronto, at Robert Dziekanski being killed by RCMP officers in the Vancouver airport in 2007 – these are national events. I think they have, to some extent, fed a public awakening that we're moving farther away from the "just trust us" police model. I think video evidence has been a great assistance to bringing home to the public that just because the police say it's so, doesn't mean it is. Many officers' accounts are unreliable, and [with video] we can observe that.

Is there a particular case you lost that still haunts you?
All of these cases haunt me. I was involved in cases like those concerning the deaths of [mentally ill men] Lester Donaldson, Edmond Yu, Wayne Williams [in Toronto], and each brings me the message that "there are none so blind as those who will not see," and that the Toronto police leadership has to take into account compassion for emotionally disturbed persons not in the frame of mind to understand a police command. They have to better create a balance for officer safety and sanctity of life. These are the hallmarks of civil society and, frankly, we all fall short. ■

Slavery still exists and the UN is doing nothing about it

Backstory

EROL ARAF

William Wilberforce, who paved the way for the abolition of the slave trade in Britain, found solace for his views in both the Old and New Testaments.

In a memorable speech delivered in the House of Commons in 1788, he explained the meaning of the Old Testament moral code regarding slavery by stressing how the Hebrews differentiated between trading in human flesh and possessing servants, who could not be sold like livestock, abused and worked to death. "God allowed them to take bondmen and bondwomen," he said, "treating them, however, with kindness, remembering their own feelings when they were slaves in Egypt, and admitting them to the chief national privileges, to the circumcision, to the Passover, and other solemn feasts, and thus instructing them in the true religion. Besides this, the slaves were to be set free at the year of Jubilee, or every 50th year."

Wilberforce would have been appalled that 183 years after the passage of the Slavery Abolition Act of 1833 in England, we have today globally over 27 million men, women and children being held as slaves. According to A21, an organization committed to combating human trafficking, each year nearly two million children are exploited in the global sex trade. Moreover, every 30 seconds another person becomes a victim of human trafficking, while the average age someone first becomes a victim is 12 years old. Ninety-nine per cent of victims are not rescued, and, only one to two per cent of slave traders are ever convicted.

The United Nations marks the International Day for the Abolition of Slavery every year on Dec. 2. One would imagine that 2014-15 UN General Assembly session would have passed a resolution condemning countries that practise the enslavement of humans by naming them, by appointing special rapporteurs to investigate all countries practising slavery, by passing specific resolutions condemning them and imposing Security Council sanctions designed to compel them to free all 27 million slaves.

There are, to be sure, generic resolutions regarding slavery, including at the UN's Human Rights Council (UNHRC). The Thirteenth Session, Agenda Item 3, concerns "Promotion and protection of all human rights, civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, including the right to development." In May 2014, UNHRC appointed Urmila Bhoola as Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of slavery, including its causes and consequences. Her report reads like a compendium of platitudes garlanded with an optimism without borders that would make Pollyanna look like a pessimist on the verge of suicide.

Not a single country is named. The reason: the worst offenders – the slave traders, child sex "recreational" tourism promoters and slave kidnappers – sit on the UNHRC.

The distinguished African human rights activist Bram Dah Abeid, president of the Initiative for the Resurgence of the Abolitionist Movement, wrote to four UN agencies, allegedly tasked with combating slavery - naming names long enough to fill the rest of this article - complaining that the UN won't condemn countries such as Mauritania because the 57 member Organization of Islamic States along with their "non-aligned" allies in the UN simply would not allow it. It is indeed a farce that child sex slave importing countries, as sitting members of the UN Human Rights Council, pass judgment on veritable democracies.

While 27 million slaves, with no hope of being rescued, perish in the dungeons of modern slave traders, the 2014-2015 UN General Assembly Session passed not one resolution condemning any country where slavery is sanctioned and openly practised. (But it passed 20 resolutions against Israel and three on the rest of the world.)

That the UN would be the repository of international legitimacy is the clearest manifestation of how an international body founded on the noblest aspirations of men has sunk into an abyss of unprecedented duplicity and cynicism. Such are the wages of multilateral fetishism.

In such a topsy-turvy world, Lewis Carroll's Alice comes to mind:

"If I had a world of my own, everything would be nonsense. Nothing would be what it is, because everything would be what it isn't. And contrary wise, what is, it wouldn't be. And what it wouldn't be, it would. You see?"

Yes, we see. ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

We're a barrel of laughs, and terror group razzed on social media

Jews are funny

Jews dominated the widely circulated list "The 100 Jokes That Shaped Modern Comedy," posted last week by Vulture, the culture site of New York magazine. The Chosen People figured prominently in at least 50 of the jokes, mostly as performers, from 1920s vaudeville, to the Marx Brothers' To War musical number in 1933's Duck Soup, to Woody Allen's intro to Annie Hall, to Jerry Seinfeld and Jason Alexander spit-balling a show about nothing on Seinfeld. The list also featured "Jewish jokes" by non-Jews, such as Bob Hope's one-liner from his 1968 Oscars monologue, "Welcome to the Academy Awards, or as it's known at my house, Passover," a reference to his lack of Oscar nominations in his long career.

Hamas mocked for 'DIY tank'

It's been an embarrassing few weeks for Hamas. After flooding killed seven of its members last month when a tunnel they were digging collapsed, and after more cave-ins last week, the terror group was mocked on social media for a new "tank" it said it built from salvaged Israeli tank parts. The olive-coloured vehicle appeared at a Feb. 1 memorial for the dead tunnel diggers. Critics on social media mocked the "DIY tank" for looking like a parade float, with wheels visible underneath its hull and tracks that didn't touch the ground. "FYI, tanks aren't made of wood and don't run on wheels," Israeli spokesperson Ofir Gendelman tweeted.

Anti-Israel group parodies NY Times

A Jewish anti-Israel group took credit for distributing thousands of fake anti-Israel parodies of the New York Times in Manhattan and on social media Feb. 2. Jewish Voice for Peace (JVP), which backs the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, said it circulated 10,000 copies, which included such articles as "Congress to Debate US Aid to Israel" and the editorial, "Our New Editorial Policy: Rethinking Israel-Palestine." Members of JVP and Jews Say No!, a New York-based pro-Palestinian group, said they created the paper to "point out how biased current reporting is on Israel and Palestine and to show what a paper that was fair and accurate could look like." ■

Speaking out on campus

We are two Hasbara Fellows representing dozens of others. Pro-Israel students like us across Canada are getting a lot of attention these days, after philanthropist Paul Bronfman delivered an ultimatum to York University, saying that his donations to the school would be cut unless it removed an anti-Israel mural in the university student centre ("York University's mural conundrum," Feb. 4).

Now, more so than in a long time, the wider pro-Israel community is taking notice of the real situation on campus for pro-Israel and Jewish students.

Pro-Israel community members are having a serious discussion about the extent and influence of anti-Israel forces on university campuses, whether it be their wide access to student government, intimidation, frequent anti-Israel articles in student newspapers, leadership in student clubs, and more.

On many campuses across the country, pro-Israel students face a well-financed juggernaut of anti-Israel groups whose sole focus is to demonize Israel. On other campuses the situation is quieter, but many students, after years of conflict, are simply apathetic.

But we haven't been silent or reactive. Hasbara Fellows have built pro-Israel social media campaigns, engaged with student governments, reached out to campus newspapers, built sustainable relationships with non-Jewish students, and run highly successful events on campus to counteract both the hate speech and the apathy rampant on campuses, and more importantly, to set a positive, proactive tone for the wider student body.

For a long time, this was all behind the scenes. But thanks to a public statement from Bronfman, more attention is being paid to what's really happening on campus, and for that, we are grateful.

Compromise at the Kotel

Shortly after Israel reunified Jerusalem in 1967, control over the Kotel was given to the Orthodox. Since then, the Kotel has been part of the ongoing struggle for religious pluralism in Israel.

Recently, an accommodation was reached by all parties ("Wall prayer fight ends with a historic compromise," Feb. 4). With government participation and approval, the Kotel will be divided and any Jew, male or female, will now be able to find a place at Judaism's holiest site to pray in peace.

It has not been easy for the ultra-Orthodox to recognize other religious streams as legitimate, but this compromise is a most visible recognition indeed. The accommodation at the Wall ought to have a strong ripple effect in Israel and the Diaspora as Jews of different stripes come to terms with a new era of religious co-operation. Let us hope that with one less issue to quarrel over, we will grow even stronger together.

The politics of the Shoah

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's Jew-free news release on International Holocaust Remembrance Day (Cjnews.com) is not just some careless goof by a rookie. I'm not buying the Trudeau walk-back, not when it's so plainly part of a growing effort in liberal circles worldwide to gradually de-Judaize the Shoah.

The Holocaust is slipping from living Jewish memory into historical memory. But will it be a Jewish historical memory? Prepare for challenge. In the decades to come, we will see more erasing of Jewish ownership of the Shoah in favour of a renovation of the Holocaust as a purely "human" tragedy.

Jews seek to retain the Shoah in the catalogue of our oppression. Secular liberals, mainline Christian churches and, of course, all those further to the left, need to denationalize the Holocaust to successfully universalize it. Delisting the Holocaust from the Jewish national estate is just one more attack on Jewish exclusivity and self-definition.

We are an inconvenient people, it seems, and whether it's through rank incompetence or some malicious sense of universalism, Canada's new prime minister has just made his own contribution to the process of erasure.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Keeping the next generation Jewish

What is the best way to secure the future of our people, and should we be worried about our long-term survival?

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: We've been engaged in this friendly dialogue for nearly two years, and I think you know me well enough to see that my objective is not to criticize other streams of Judaism. My question to you this week is thus out of concern for the future of our people.

It's no secret that both Reform and Conservative Judaism are on the decline in North America. Memberships are down, schools are closing, and the next generation is checking out. (Granted, Conservative Judaism appears to be declining more rapidly than Reform Judaism, but that's shallow consolation.) Moreover, many have suggested that Reform congregations are only able to maintain their current levels by accepting more intermarried families. Even the relatively small percentage of Orthodox who leave the fold are not largely joining Conservative or Reform congregations, but are instead going completely secular.

What is the end game? Is there any plan to stem the hemorrhaging of our tribe? How can we save these Jewish souls and keep the next generation part of the faith?

Rabbi Grushcow: Denominations are modern inventions. As I often teach, we have Napoleon to thank for the current configuration of the Jewish world. The act of making Jews citizens raised the question of how to be a Jew in a world that actually accepts us.

I'm deeply committed to Reform Judaism, because I think it opens important doors and has a compelling vision of Jewish life. We don't welcome intermarried folks because we are worried about our numbers – we welcome them because we believe they make the Jewish people stronger.

Will Judaism in 100 years have the same configurations and denominations? Almost certainly not. Will there still be different approaches and ideologies, communities and practices? Almost certainly yes.

In terms of the current difference between movements, I think a lot has to do with simple demographics – Orthodox families tend to be bigger, for example. But I'm not especially interested in a numbers game. I see exciting things happening in every part of the Jewish world.

Do we have to re-examine the synagogue model? I think we do. Should every movement do the cheshbon ha-nefesh, self-examination, to make sure we are serving the Jewish People the best we can? Absolutely. But am I worried about the long-term survival of Judaism? No. I trust God on that one.

Rabbi Korobkin: Faith and optimism in the eternality of the Jewish People is a wonderful sentiment, and it certainly is echoed in the Psalmist's promise that "God will never forsake His people." But that's not really the point I'm concerned about.

We as rabbis have a responsibility to create viable and durable Jewish institutions and ways of life that guarantee a future. Orthodoxy utilizes a foundational paradigm that has never changed – that is, the system of Halachah. When Jews commit to a life of halachic practice – Shabbat, kashrut, etc. – there is a greater likelihood that their children and grandchildren will adhere to and identify with Judaism.

As warm and welcoming as your congregation is, does it have lasting power? How many multi-generational families regularly pray with you? When Conservative and Reform communities memberships are down and schools are closing, is it not perhaps time for an overhaul?

Rabbi Grushcow: We have many multi-generational families at our temple, as did my previous congregation in New York. In fact, this past Kol Nidre, four generations of women lit the candles together.

It is possible to take Judaism seriously without being within the framework of Halachah. It is possible to take Shabbat seriously without observing a traditional Shabbat. I see my congregants doing this all the time.

Although a sense of traditional obligation has its power, there is also something incredibly compelling to a Jewish practice that is chosen. That's what keeps people in, and brings people in. Many of them are drawn here precisely because their Judaism matters to them, but more traditional settings just aren't a fit with their values and their lives.

I say all this with respect equal to that with which you started this conversation. We both care deeply about Judaism. My own conviction is that the Jewish world is stronger because both our communities are here. ■

From Yoni's Desk

For Israeli bloggers, the rules are the same but different

Since 1948, Israel's chief military censor has played a significant role in determining how the country's news media operate. The rules governing the military's ability to dictate what can and cannot be reported by Israeli media, as well as by foreign correspondents, have changed over time, but the overarching justification for censorship – Israel's unique and ongoing security concerns – has not.

Generally speaking, journalists working in Israel accept censorship as a reasonable, if somewhat limiting practice in a country where even the smallest of details buried in a news story can have major security implications.

That changed last week when reports emerged indicating as many as 30 well-trafficked Israeli blogs and popular Facebook users would henceforth be required to submit copy to the military censor prior to publication. As the news spread, some of those affected by the new rules lashed out online, questioning whether the military – and, by extension, the state – was actively trying to limit freedom of expression. A few even vowed to circumvent censorship, though, given that the office of the military censor already possesses algorithmic technology to root out problematic web posts, this seems easier said than done.

Still, the new online censorship rules signal a turning point for Israeli media, a recognition that the traditional forms of news reporting and dissemination are being challenged, if not supplanted, by bloggers and the viral power of social media influencers.

Of course, this is not a uniquely Israeli issue – in recent weeks, some of Canada's own news media giants, including Torstar, Postmedia and Rogers, have announced major cutbacks to print services amid declining revenues. Since many of these media companies place heavy bets on online platforms, Canadians are left to wonder where our own national media practice is heading.

Whichever way the media revolution plays out, the reliability of news sources will continue to be a key area of scrutiny, especially when it comes to Israel. Last week, hours after an attack by three Palestinian terrorists at the Damascus Gate in Jerusalem left 19-year-old border policewoman Hadar Cohen dead, CBS News ran the headline "3 Palestinians killed as daily violence grinds on" on its website. Accusations of biased reporting came swiftly from Israel's Foreign Ministry (whose spokesman, Emmanuel Nachshon, called the headline "unparalleled chutzpah"), as well as from many people online. Eventually, the headline was changed to "Palestinians kill Israeli officer, wound another before being killed."

The CBS fiasco illustrates just how poor news reporting from and about Israel can sometimes be. Even so, media bias is not an excuse for censorship, in Israel or anywhere else. But if upstart online journalists and bloggers in Israel expect to play by different rules than their ink-stained competitors when it comes to security matters, that argument doesn't seem to have much merit, either.

In a country with such varied opinions and intense conversations as Israel, the new journalists have an important role to play, and part of it is to break some of the editorial rules by which the news industry has long abided. And yet, when it comes to Israel's security, everyone should play by the same standards. Some rules are not meant to be broken. ■ — YONI

TRAVEL

Germany has come a long way towards a collective tshuvah

Gil Gross

In August 2014, my family joined me in breaking a long-standing Jewish taboo. We spent almost three weeks of our summer vacation in Germany.

My parents' childhood memories of Budapest wartime ghetto life, terror-stricken flight, and murdered relatives remain raw and unadulterated. I belong to that next-generation demographic which has typically spurned all things German – language, culture, consumer products and, above all, personal visits.

At least, that was the case for the first 50 years of my life.

But recently, my attitude began to shift, influenced by a number of factors. At first, the change was almost imperceptible, but, over the past five years or so, I developed a nearly obsessive fascination with the Nazi era that could be quenched only by visiting places that had heretofore held an almost mythically inaccessible status in my psyche. This was especially true of Berlin which is, arguably, ground zero for 20th century western – and possibly global – history, encompassing two devastating world wars and the critically eventful years between them, the Cold War, and the fall of communism, culminating in the emergence of the economic powerhouse that is today one of Israel's most steadfast European supporters.

Our trip started in Hamburg, where we first encountered stolpersteine (stumbling stones), the brass plaques installed in sidewalks in front of buildings in most German cities and towns from which Jews were deported. Each plaque names a victim, listing the date and place of his or her death; "ermordet," meaning "murdered," is the word engraved on most plaques.

Meanwhile, the city's museum, which almost certainly caters more to German visitors than international tourists, has devoted most of its second floor to a beautifully presented and curated permanent exhibit on the long history of the Jews of Hamburg. Perhaps even more surprisingly, the municipality offers, free and in several languages, a complete city map featuring all sites of Jewish interest, including those of the Holocaust.

Our next stop was the former East German city of Leipzig, renowned for its role as the cradle of the German enlightenment at its peak in the 18th and 19th centuries. Walking toward the old town centre, we suddenly came upon an unusual monument occupying most of a city square: 140 metal chairs arrayed in tidy rows, sitting empty under the open sky. We soon discovered that this had been the site of Leipzig's main synagogue, built in 1854 and swept away along with so many others on Kristallnacht. The accompanying memorial details the fate of Leipzig's prewar Jewish community.

Berlin, where we spent 10 days including two shabbatot, reputedly has the world's fastest growing urban Jewish community; the most consistent estimates suggest a current Jewish population of around 60,000, including many from the former Soviet Union and Israel. The prewar count is said to have been 160,000, of whom around 8,000 – fully 5 per cent – were remarkably still living in the city when the war ended; more than half of the prewar population managed to flee, while some 55,000 were murdered.

It is not hard to understand the appeal that today's Berlin holds for Jews looking for economic and cultural opportunities in a very liberal atmosphere. Moreover, the very fact that Jews can feel comfortable living in today's Germany seems to reveal something important about the political and societal changes that have taken place there since 1945 and, especially, since reunification. By contrast, the Iberian Peninsula remains almost completely bereft of Jews nearly two centuries after the Inquisition formally ended.

To my mind, what uniquely characterizes Germany's success in recreating itself from the ashes of its horrific past is an unblinking, unqualified acknowledgment of that past, and of the societal, political, and economic factors that enabled it. Unlike in other European countries, where the Shoah is counted as just one among many misfortunes inflicted by "fascists" or "national socialists" – as if they were some alien species who inexplicably descended on an unwitting population – what we experienced in Germany, again and again, was a clear-eyed, unsentimental willingness to say "look in the mirror – this is what we (or our parents/grandparents) did."

The Deutches Historisches Museum, Germany's national history museum, devotes a huge space to an unflinching examination of the rise of National Socialism and its catastrophic consequences. The idyllic Wannsee Villa, where Reinhard Heydrich, Adolf Eichmann, and top Nazi brass laid the logistical groundwork for the Final Solution in early 1942, is now an educational centre, visited by German schoolchildren on field trips. Sachsenhausen, one of the earliest concentration camps where SS guards were trained for their brutal assignments, now serves a major educational function, and the adjoining former SS barracks has been pointedly and deliberately converted into the modern Federal Police training school.

Wherever we went in Berlin, I felt no hesitation about wearing my kippah openly. To the extent that our clearly visible identity elicited any reaction at all, the most typical was one of friendly curiosity. The only exception to this pattern was at Berlin's imposing Holocaust memorial, where a recent visitor had inscribed the guest book with the words "Free Palestine", and where a swarthy looking young man standing just beyond the exit – perhaps the author of that contemptuous message – hissed the same words at us as we walked past.

For me, the key question was – and continues to be – whether a culture and society which produced the most murderous and malignant form of totalitarianism that the world has ever known could recreate itself over the span of just a couple of generations in a way that would give depth and substance to the too-easily mouthed platitude of "never again." And after exploring today's Germany, I am left with cautious hope that, if there is such a thing as "collective tshuvah" yielding a positive and sustainable long-term effect on a people's attitudes and actions, then the Germans – perhaps in their stereotypically methodical and efficient way – have come a long way toward realizing it. ■

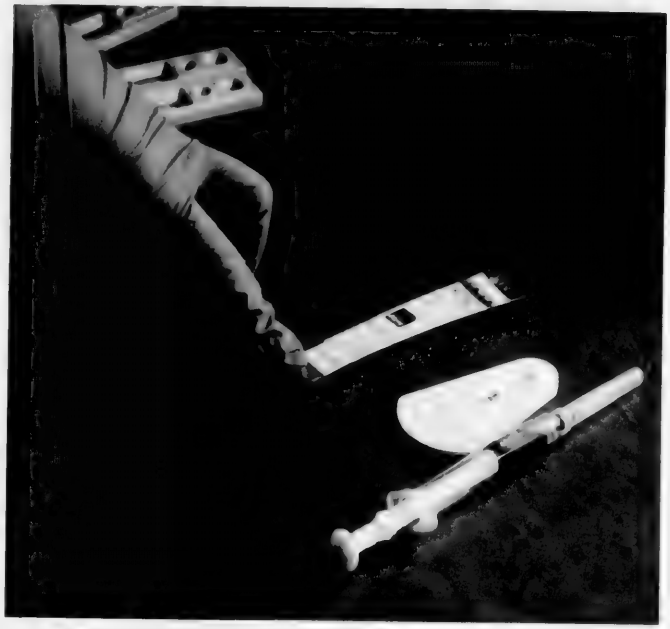
Living with HIV in the Jewish community

When I was diagnosed, I didn't know any Jews with the disease. That soon changed



LOUISE BINDER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When I was diagnosed with HIV more than 20 years ago, I barely knew anyone with this disease, let alone someone else who was Jewish with HIV. My general practitioner at the time was Jewish, though, as was my infectious disease specialist. They told me about a Passover seder put on by Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto for people with HIV called the Third Seder. It was there that I first met other Jewish people with HIV and recognized that there were Jewish people in the community who cared about us. For many years, this tradition continued, and I always looked forward to it.

As HIV changed from a deadly illness to a chronic, manageable condition with the advent of effective drug treatments, everyone heaved an enormous sigh of relief. The Third Seder stopped, as did much of my involvement with the institutional side of Judaism.

I did, and still do, have some very close Jewish friends with HIV and in the HIV community. We share our own brand of Jewish humour about having this disease, and about the world in general. We have joined a non-traditional Jewish synagogue led by a lesbian rabbi and attend High Holidays there each year, marvelling that we have lived more than 20 years longer than our doctors predicted.

My life has changed beyond recognition. I was a lawyer with a good corporate job when I found out that my husband had infected me with HIV sometime in the late 1980s or early 1990s. He became so depressed during our marriage that it just fell apart. In retrospect, he obviously knew about his diagnosis and did not know how to disclose it to me. Knowing that there were no treatments at that point, he probably did not know what to say.

What I learned from the powerful Jewish voices working within the AIDS movement

RON ROSENES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I am a survivor, a witness and now, it seems, a pioneer.

Living with HIV for more than 30 years qualifies me as a long-term survivor. During the course of those years, I became a witness, not only to the loss of so many friends and colleagues, but also to the remarkable advances in treatment and understanding of the underlying conditions that drive infection with HIV. I am a pioneer, because I find myself in the first group of "baby boomers" to face the challenges of living and aging with HIV.

Coming out to parents and friends as a gay man in my teens was manageable. Getting an HIV diagnosis in the early days of the epidemic was much more traumatic, and disclosure felt like coming out all over again. My mother died before I could tell her. I didn't want to burden her at the time of her own illness, but I knew she would have loved me all the same. My dad didn't like to talk about personal matters, but we maintained a good relationship for the duration of his life.

I was raised in a loving Jewish family in Ottawa, learned to read but not speak Hebrew, had a bar mitzvah and went to a Conservative shul on the High Holidays. Today, I attend a Reconstructionist congregation, where I find a welcoming community. For all this, I am grateful.

I worked as a Russian and French professor, then started a business for myself, but eventually I had to stop working when I lost my partner of 15 years to AIDS and my own health declined. I was able to support myself thanks to private insurance for long-term disability and slowly returned to work as a volunteer. By 1997, there were major improvements in treatment, and my health rebounded sufficiently to allow me to continue my work as a community advocate for access to treatment at the local, national and international level.

As a young man, I was "apolitical," but as I joined the AIDS movement, I heard powerful Jewish voices around me. I read Susan Sontag's essay, HIV as Metaphor, which taught me about the psychosocial origins of blame and stigma that are associated with disease, whether tuberculosis or cancer at the time, or HIV today.

Kaddish for the first time

Avrum Rosensweig

The first Kaddish I recited after my mother's death was shocking to my ears. I resented it. Hearing the words "Yitkadal v'yitkadash" coming from my lips didn't seem right. It hurt.

She couldn't be gone. I don't accept her passing. These Aramaic words and that ominous tune, like a dirge, should be the utterance of an older man for his wife or by a woman for a parent who had died many years before.

But this prayer – the Mourners Kaddish – was now mine. My Mom had died and the second Kaddish made that clear. "May his great name be blessed forever."

For a while after my mother's demise, I said no when Michael Rubin asked me to daven for the congregation at the Beth David chapel, or Zev Kaufman at Mishkan Avraham. I felt emotionally shaky and didn't want to publicly cry during the Kaddish – a very real possibility. Eventually I agreed and began to benefit from hearing the "amens" of the very supportive and colourful congregants. They helped me to feel less alone. They are heartfelt. They are authentic. They are my village.

Praying, and more specifically saying Kaddish, takes some getting used to. First, it's imperative that while you are saying the Kaddish you have an ear open to hear others who are doing the same. The entire group must be in sync with one another or else this significant piece of liturgy will sound confusing to the congregation and the amens will come at different times. Should this happen, there is a risk that fewer than 10 people – a minyan – will respond to one's Kaddish. A fragmented response can easily throw off the reader's intention.

Second, the 45 seconds or so it takes to say Kaddish is to be a moment of introspection when people focus on their loved one, in some way attaching themselves to their soul. It is said that Kaddish is a prayer that pushes the neshamah – the soul – higher. It is therefore crucial that no interruptions of any sort occur during the reading.

> When I recite the Kaddish, I create an image in my mind of my mother sitting in front of me

When I recite the Kaddish, I create an image in my mind of my mother sitting in front of me, smiling widely as she does and listening closely to her prayer. I feel as if she is sending me a message all is well in heaven and the spiritual boost she gets from my Kaddish is appreciated, as it pushes her toward the higher gates leading closer to God.

Kaddish is a reaffirmation of life. In fact neither the word death nor any reference to it can be found in the prayer. The sages say this is done so that we, the mourners, do not drown in our sorrow. It's important that we do not forget to live while we are experiencing a death.

Every morning and every evening throughout the world where a Jewish community resides, minyanim are taking place and somebody is saying Kaddish. This prayer, more than 800 years old, connects us the living to those who have perished. It creates that point of intersection between earth and heaven. Those who recite the Kaddish are the conduits. Those who answer with "amen" are the connectors.

As the final amen is said, our village is strengthened. Through that amen, the mourners are indeed reminded to live, and the rest of the congregation is encouraged to hold us up and reserve a place amongst them, the joyous.

"He who makes peace in His heights, may He make peace upon us and upon all of Israel. Now say: amen." ■

Finding guidance in the melody of the Torah

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

The Zohar remarks that even a sefer Torah can be subject to luck – some are destined to be used prominently, while others are fated to gather dust and be ignored. If that is so, I know of one of the luckiest Torah scrolls in the world, which, despite the fact it sits humbly in a bomb shelter in Jerusalem, is arguably the most important sefer Torah in the world today.

This sefer Torah was donated in response to a terrible tragedy. Shira Banki, a 16-year-old student, was murdered last summer while marching in the Jerusalem Pride Parade. Her assailant was a haredi Jew who despised gay rights. Sadly, judging from pashkevil (posted) notices put up after her murder, a significant number of people in the murderer's community supported this horrible crime.

At the same time, this murder disturbed many other Orthodox Jews who were disgusted that the Torah was used as a justification for bloodshed. In particular, this horrible crime had a profound impact on Dr. Mark Wainberg, a leading AIDS researcher who is also an observant Jew. For him, this was a clash of the two worlds he lives in. He's a past president of an Orthodox synagogue and at the same time works side by side with the LGBTQ community in the battle against AIDS. Mark decided to do something dramatic in response to this awful murder: he pledged to donate a sefer Torah in Shira Banki's memory. Shira had been murdered in the name of Halachah, and the murderer said the Torah was on his side. In response, this sefer Torah declares loudly that the Torah stands on the side of Shira, on the side of dignity, decency and the Jewish People.

After months of preparation, the day arrived. Shira's family asked that the Torah be given to a disadvantaged community. After some investigation, an Ethiopian synagogue housed in a bomb shelter on the periphery of Jerusalem was chosen to receive it. A few dozen members of the synagogue, some members of Shira's family and friends, and members of the Israeli AIDS research community gathered for the dedication. And there something remarkable occurred. Jews of every background – haredi, secular, Ethiopian, Ashkenazi, American and Israeli – pulled together to dedicate this Torah. Shira's mother, Mika, remarked in her speech that "Just like Jews have suffered together for generations, so it is fitting that when we are finally in our own country that we be together, for good and for bad, without checking each other's tzitzit." And for a moment in this ramshackle synagogue, that hope came true.

> The Torah stands on the side of Shira, on the side of dignity, decency and the Jewish People.

That's why Shira's Torah is exceptional. There are those who carry the Torah in the name of animosity and division. But this Torah is different. It's a Torah of unity and humanity. The Talmud compares the Torah to a song ("Shira" is the Hebrew word for song). The point of this metaphor is that like any song, the words are incomprehensible without fully understanding the melody. You need to follow the tune in order to know the purpose and emotion behind those words. The Torah cannot be understood without hearing its inner melody, without hearing the song of the Jewish People.

For a contemporary Orthodox Jew, there are struggles that arise when reading some sections of the Torah, including the prohibition against homosexuality. I cannot diminish the authority of what is black-letter law, but at the same time, I cannot forget the incredible humanism implicit in seeing in every human being a reflection of the divine. As I struggle with these questions, I recognize that I may not merit a way to find a reconciling verse. But nevertheless, I can still find guidance in the melody of the Torah, whose tune is one of kindness, charity, blessing and life. And Shira's Torah sings this melody, a melody the Jewish world so sorely needs. ■

The past belongs to us, but we mustn't get lost in it

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Amos Oz, the distinguished Israeli writer, speaking recently in Jerusalem, argued that the past belongs to us, but we don't belong to the past. Though he may not have had religion in mind, his formulation well reflects what most religious streams in contemporary Judaism are about.

Exponents of modern Judaism know that to be authentic, they must be rooted in the past, but to be relevant, they must reflect the present. The non-fundamentalist streams may each have different ways of mixing tradition and modernity, but none wants to ignore either.

Even Jewish secularists who may wish to reject what they deem to be antiquated and irrelevant religion need the Jewish past to be able to express themselves as Jews.

Similarly, those whom we know as modern Orthodox and are committed to the past see themselves in the context of the present. They differ fundamentally from those who claim total adherence to the past, as per the oft-quoted dictum by the Chatam Sofer (1762-1839) that everything new is forbidden by the Torah.

Though Israel as a modern democracy largely functions according to Oz's formula, with most of its religious, intellectual and social movements reflecting it, two kinds of Judaism there seem bent on negating the present. One is ultra-Orthodox (haredi), the other ultra-nationalist.

For all their zeal and passion, both constitute a danger to the future of the state. You only have to walk through a haredi neighbourhood to see the unrealistic efforts to recreate the past and ignore today's world other than its technology. Even when they reap social and other benefits of the state, they resist contributing to it, for instance, by refusing to serve in the Israel Defence Forces.

The other kind of embracing the past and rejecting present realities is prevalent among religious nationalists. Unlike haredim, they're part of the mainstream and are committed to the defence of the State of Israel. But the state that some, perhaps many, want is rooted in obsolete messianic ideas that fly in the face of what's possible and just in our time. They can be found among the settlers in the West Bank as well as among extremists who harass Christian and Muslim holy places and fantasize about rebuilding the ancient Temple in Jerusalem.

Ironically, though both these ostensibly authentically Jewish streams seek to distance themselves from non-Jews, much of their ideology is influenced by contemporary radical manifestations in other faiths. Thus evangelicals in the United States hold corresponding views, albeit in a very different context, to both the ultra-Orthodox and the nationalists. And Muslim jihadists show uncanny similarities to the extremist elements in the national religious movement.

They all constitute a threat to Israel. Despite the evangelicals' professed commitment to Israel, they may love Jews, but many hate Judaism and look forward to the time when we'll all finally see the light and embrace Christianity. And jihadists are, of course, proud and eager to show the world that they're our sworn enemies.

We've learned how to withstand onslaughts from without. There's no danger of Jews embracing Christianity en masse. Similarly, contemporary Israel is strong enough to fight off attempts by Muslim extremists bent on its destruction.

But it's less certain that Israel will remain a Jewish democratic state that's rooted in the present. The danger comes from ultra-Orthodox and ultra-nationalist Jews, both gaining adherents and both bent on eradicating as much as they can of the open Israeli society. Their political arms, currently in the government, have displayed ominous signs to that effect. And once democracy goes, the very existence of Israel is in jeopardy.

That's why all other streams in Judaism must disregard the differences between them to jointly defend that democracy. Diaspora support, currently too often favouring extremists in the guise of commitment to the Jewish state, must come together to make sure that the past remains ours, but that we don't get lost in it. ■

Canada must not cave to Iranian demands

Sheryl Saperia

Over the last several weeks, terror victims have squared off against the Islamic Republic of Iran in a Toronto courtroom, seeking to hold that regime civilly liable for its sponsorship of terrorism. In court, Judge Glenn Hainey wondered aloud whether the legal proceedings were "academic," given Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion's recent comments about restoring Canada-Iran relations.

Dion indicated that Canada would be lifting sanctions imminently against the Islamic Republic. He also referred to the previous Conservative government's decision to cut diplomatic ties with Iran as "ideological and irresponsible," and expressed a desire to re-open the Canadian Embassy in Tehran.

Meanwhile, one analyst has suggested that the Canadian designation of Iran as a state sponsor of terror under the Justice of Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA), a bill passed in 2012 that allows civil lawsuits against supporters of terrorism, is a "booby trap" preventing reconciliation between the two countries.

Within this context, Hainey's confusion is understandable. Having conveyed interest in re-establishing diplomatic relations and enabling corporate Canada to benefit from business, the Trudeau government has made itself vulnerable to Iranian demands. It would come as no surprise if evidence were to emerge that Tehran is heavily pressuring Ottawa to remove the economic sanctions against Iran under the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA) and to rescind the label of state sponsor of terror as conditions for wider rapprochement.

Ottawa must not bow to these demands. The Iranian regime is a prolific sponsor of terrorism and violator of human rights, and should be treated as such.

Iran has the highest per capita rate of capital punishment, with 2015 – under the leadership of "moderate" President Hassan Rouhani – boasting the highest execution rate in the past 25 years. Under Iranian law, girls are held criminally accountable from the age of nine and can be sentenced to death. According to the latest report by the UN's special rapporteur for human rights in Iran, the Islamic Republic engages in numerous forms of torture, including the surgical removal of eyes, hand amputations and flogging. Journalists and human rights activists are jailed. Members of the Baha'i faith are systematically persecuted as a matter of government policy. And Iranian theocrats regularly call for the eradication of the State of Israel, in contravention of the international convention of genocide.

In response to the July 2015 nuclear deal of the P5+1 (the five permanent UN members plus Germany), the Liberal party declared, "Iran must be held to account for its support of terrorist organizations, its long-standing human rights violations, its aggression toward Israel, as well as its nuclear program." In January 2016, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau pledged "to work alongside our allies to ensure that we are behaving in a responsible way to move Iran away from its position of violation of human rights, of nuclear ambitions, and indeed of sponsoring terrorism around the world."

Trudeau has also promised to play a constructive role in helping resolve the Syrian conflict. In doing so, he should keep in mind that the Iranian regime, by supplying Bashar Assad with funds, weapons, advisers and fighters, is as culpable as ISIS for the violence, death and displacement in the region.

De-listing Iran as a state sponsor of terror or lifting all economic sanctions would not only be at odds with the stated commitments of the Canadian government, but would also be offside Canada's closest international allies. The United States, for example, which doggedly led efforts to reach a nuclear deal with Iran, insists that Iran will remain a state sponsor of terror under American law and subject to sanctions for terrorism and human rights abuses.

Re-engagement with Iran must elicit responsiveness to Canada's longtime concerns about the regime's conduct. The victims of the regime's crimes cannot afford to have the terms of the Canada-Iran relationship dictated by the bullies in Tehran. ■

Panel on depression and suicide 'strikes a chord'

The turnout alone for an event at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation titled "Depression and Suicide in the Jewish Community" was quite telling.

Roughly 450 people packed the synagogue's main sanctuary Feb. 4 to listen to a panel of speakers discuss the causes, symptoms and consequences of depression and suicide as it manifests in adolescents, adults and seniors, and to stress the need as a community to eradicate the stigma associated with mental health issues.

"The topic clearly strikes a chord," said Molyn Leszcz, psychiatrist-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital and moderator of a panel that consisted of Danielle Berman, founder of a campaign to raise awareness for mental illness and suicide called Ride Away Stigma; Marshall Korenblum, psychiatrist-in-chief at Hincks-Dellcrest Centre for Children and Families; Lesley Wiesenfeld, deputy psychiatrist-in-chief at Mount Sinai; and Jonathan Golden, director of clinical service at Jewish Family & Child (JF & CS).

Rabbi Noah Cheses of Shaarei Shomayim told The CJN that the event, initiated by several congregants from Shaarei Shomayim and Beth Tzedec Congregation, was co-ordinated "in reaction to occurrences that struck and rattled us."

He said a number of his congregants and members of the broader Jewish community were affected by suicides that occurred over the summer.

He also referred to an incident last fall in which a young man who had attended Camp Ramah and was known by many of his teenage congregants took his own life.

"[These events] precipitated conversations, but these weren't happening at the Shabbes table. They were hush hush. So we felt a responsibility to bring to the forefront a community conversation and shed light on an area that's long been in the shadows," he said.

The talk was sponsored by the two synagogues, as well as Camp Ramah, JF & CS, Mount Sinai, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Leszcz gave an introductory address, emphasizing the need in Canada for a concentrated effort by communities, schools, workplaces and governments to invest in mental health prevention and treatment.

Governments are falling short, he said, noting, "Canada should be spending 13 per cent of its health-care budget on mental illness, and instead it spends seven, the lowest among virtually all the world's wealthy countries. Yet we know that every dollar invested in mental health care returns a fourfold increase in productivity and lowers health costs."

Further, while progress has been made in terms of greater discussion of mental health issues in the media and popular culture, Leszcz stressed that a stigma prevails and is extremely destructive.

"It's a form of discrimination, and we know that being an object of discrimination is poor for mental health," he said.

Stigma contributes to individuals' unwillingness to seek treatment, he said, and the outcome of that can be lethal.

"Suicide takes the lives of 15 out of every 100,000 people in this country and is the leading cause of death for males between the ages of 10 and 49... despite advances in mental health care over the years, suicides have not declined."

Leszcz pointed to the risk of depression going untreated, explaining that each untreated episode increases the likelihood of having another one.

Countering stigma requires comprehensive intervention tactics that address prevention and early recognition of mental illness, holistic treatments and maintenance of care, he said.

On the prevention side, for example, schools can work to create healthier environments that are more accepting of diversity, because there's a toxic connection between bullying and depression.

"And we need to take pressure off our young folks. Kids need to know they can be good and successful without being at the very top [of their class]," Leszcz said.

Workplaces should promote greater psychological safety, and more advocacy is needed to increase research and funding for mental illness.

"Forty years ago, we declared a war on cancer. We need to do the same now with mental illness," he said.

Wiesenfeld spoke about how depression affects older adults, pointing to loss, declined physical health and a sense of being invisible or socially isolated as common contributors.

It's important for family members of older adults to urge loved ones to seek treatment if they have signs of depression, she said.

Korenblum addressed what depression looks like in adolescents, highlighting its range of causes, symptoms and the crucial need for accessible treatment options.

Leszcz told The CJN there's a strong possibility the organizers will plan more events on mental illness in the community.

He said he hopes the audience's biggest takeaway is that the community should feel a sense of responsibility every step along the way, "from birth of a child through development, school, organizations, synagogue life, etc., to create psychologically safe environments that promote strong connections, build resilience and recognize when help is needed." ■

Cotler helms new Wallenberg Centre for Human Rights

plungen@thecjn.ca

Irwin Cotler and Stéphane Dion are friends and former parliamentary colleagues, so it was no surprise the current foreign affairs minister met with the former minister of justice Feb. 5 to discuss issues on Cotler's mind, including, human rights, Iran, and terrorism in Israel.

Cotler, who left parliament last fall after a distinguished career that included time as justice minister and attorney general, raised issues that are high on the agenda of the new organization he's created, the Raoul Wallenberg Centre for Human Rights.

The centre is named for the wartime Swedish diplomat who saved hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews from the Nazis. Wallenberg was arrested by Soviet forces in 1945 and disappeared in the Soviet camp system. His fate remains unknown.

Cotler said the centre will continue Wallenberg's humanitarian legacy and pursue justice. Its mission statement includes opposing anti-Semitism and genocide, promoting human rights and defending political prisoners. The organization is an international consortium of parliamentarians, scholars, jurists, human rights advocates, NGOs and students. Its honorary co-chairs are Nobel Prize winner Elie Wiesel; Supreme Court of Canada Justice Rosalie Abella; former Swedish prime minister Goran Persson; and Meir Shamgar, former president of Israel's Supreme Court.

During their meeting, Cotler briefed Dion on several upcoming centre initiatives and raised the issue of Iranian human rights violations. A longstanding advocate of Iran sanctions, Cotler acknowledged that with the nuclear deal, "automatic" Security Council sanctions are being lifted by western countries.

But the threat posed by Iran's nuclear program is only one of five problematic aspects of that country's policy, he told Dion. Iran remains a highly repressive state that last month set a new record for executions – greater than its usual number, which still gave it the dubious distinction of being the world leader, per capita, in state executions.

Iran continues to incite genocide against Israel and Jews, it sponsors terrorism, and its hegemonic ambitions are a threat to its neighbours, Cotler said. For those reasons, he urged Dion to maintain sanctions.

Cotler also briefed Dion about his personal familiarity with terrorism. When visiting his children in Israel recently, he learned of a terror attack in the town where his daughter lives. She was safe, but she knew the woman who had been assaulted and who drove off her attacker. Terrorism is widely reported in Israel, but barely any mention is made in the Canadian press of frequent attacks or of the constant incitement to violence by Palestinian leaders, he said.

Stéphane Dion

Irwin Cotler

Cotler also extended an invitation to Dion to participate in a symposium scheduled for May 4 to 6 at the Jagiellonian University in Krakow, Poland, sponsored by the centre in conjunction with the March of the Living. The gathering will examine the legacy of the Nuremberg war crimes trials on their 70th anniversary, along with the Nazi-era Nuremberg laws that preceded the Holocaust.

Cotler told The CJN the centre is embarking on several major initiatives in only its first few months in operation. On Feb. 17 and 18, it will launch the Raoul Wallenberg all-party parliamentary caucus for human rights in Ottawa; on Feb. 23 and 24 it will co-sponsor the Geneva Summit for Human Rights and Democracy, featuring human rights heroes from around the world; on Feb. 25, it will sponsor "Justice for Sergei Magnitsky rule of law project" in Ottawa (Magnitsky was an accountant who died in jail after uncovering massive fraud and theft by Russian officials); from March 13 to 17, the Centre will hold the Wallenberg lecture at the McGill Centre for Human Rights and Legal Pluralism; and from May 16 to 18, it will sponsor Iran Accountability Week in Ottawa, which, it is hoped, will turn attention to Iranian political prisoners.

It's an ambitious agenda, but Cotler is excited about the prospects for affecting change. "I'm devoting myself full time to this. The demands at this point of the pursuit of international justice is as great as it has ever been." ■

Going to the Super Bowl? There's an app for that

plungen@thecjn.ca

For a company that prides itself on providing up-to-date, state-of-the art digital solutions to sports companies' marketing efforts, Channel 1 Media Solutions owes its name to some pretty old technology.

Time was, if you wanted to watch television, you were limited to perhaps 13 channels. You could tune into each channel using a rotary dial, but the stations always started at 2.

There was no channel 1 – it was a blank spot on the dial – at least until Evan Karasick and his then-partner, Colin Stein, gave it a new meaning. Their vision was to offer a new approach to marketing and selling that you couldn't find in traditional advertising companies. Hence Channel 1, or as Karasick put it, "We wanted to be Channel 1, different and number 1."

His idea of an interactive online platform for customers to buy and renew tickets, view seating plans, buy merchandise, arrange a parking spot and learn about special events, has caught on with the majority of sports franchises in North America. He estimates that 82 per cent of the teams in the NFL, Major League Baseball, the NHL and Major League Soccer are his clients.

His game plan has proven so successful that Channel 1 was given the contract to produce this year's official Super Bowl website and app, with information on events, restaurants, parking and more.

Karasick, 47, prides himself on being first and best in providing solutions to sports organizations. One of Channel 1's products is an interactive fan survey that generates new leads. Other platforms are geared for corporate and high end clients and there's a presentation tool for team sales staff to use that takes less time to prepare than traditional slide shows.

"Sales is a numbers game," Karasick said. "If you throw more spaghetti at the wall and see what sticks, you'll sell more."

Channel 1, which Karasick owns after he and Stein went their separate ways, grosses somewhere between $3 million and $4 million a year. "It's a high margin business," he said, though he won't be more specific about profitability.

Interestingly, it was a convergence of circumstances that led him to the business in the first place. A native of Vancouver, Karasick was looking for something that he could sink his teeth into. At 27, he underwent psychological evaluation to help him determine a career path.

The ones that best suited him were graphic design, architecture and industrial design.

Evan Karasick and the Road to 50 app

He enrolled in a course at the B.C. Institute of Technology, studying design, art forms, sculpture and AutoCAD, a computer drafting program. Afterwards, Stein, who worked as a graphic designer for the Vancouver Canucks, opened some doors to the team's marketing department. Together they created a CD-ROM to help the Canucks sell tickets, "and it spread like wildfire," Karasick said.

It included seat locations, price charts, description of amenities, information about parking and payment options. "Back then, it was crazy innovative," he said.

It was so successful that in 1999, the Canucks used it to make a presentation to other NHL teams at a league-wide marketing meeting. Word spread and soon Channel 1 was fielding orders for its products. "That was the big break," Karasick said.

Within three years of Channel 1's first contract with the Canucks, it had added the Nashville Predators, Los Angeles Kings, Columbus Blue Jackets and Chicago Blackhawks to its roster of clients.

Through word of mouth, Channel 1 continued to grow. "I have never responded to an RFP [request for proposal]. People know about us, and we're the place to go when you want stuff done," he said.

And although the focus of his business is sports, it turns out, "I'm not a big sports fan," Karasick said.

In 2002, he moved the operation to Toronto, and he currently runs an office downtown, employing 14 people on site and another six who work out of the office. The job comes with some special perks, like a free trip to the Super Bowl in San Francisco.

The trip with his staff gave Karasick a chance to meet and "talk sports, businesses and corporate marketing. The secret to my success is relationships," which usually focus on the business of sports, not what's happening in the game, he said.

After all, in the world of sports entertainment, if you can save a company money and enhance its sales, isn't that just as important as wins and losses? ■

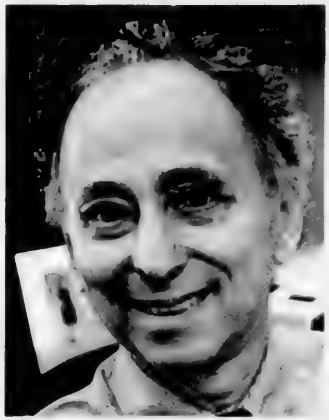
Doctor honoured for helping Third World kids

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca



Stanley Zlotkin

About 30 million children in developing countries can thank Toronto-based Dr. Stanley Zlotkin for coming up with an easy fix to their mineral and vitamin deficiencies, and last month, he was honoured by the province for his initiative.

"This all started close to 20 years ago when UNICEF asked me to come and assist them with a problem they had identified, which was a deficiency of iron in children around the world," said Zlotkin, who has worked as a clinician-nutritionist and research scientist at the Hospital for Sick Children since 1980, and received the Order of Ontario in a ceremony on Jan. 20.

"At that time, the estimate was around 300 to 500 million children with iron deficiency. And although they had iron drops available for 100 years, they weren't working for a number of practical reasons."

Zlotkin explained that the iron drops had a very strong taste that caused children to spit them out, they would stain children's teeth brown, and parents struggled with understanding the proper dosage, since the measurements were in metric units.

"So UNICEF's question to me was, 'Can you come up with an idea that would help solve this problem?'"

Zlotkin said that in Canada, there isn't a big problem with iron deficiency in children because virtually all baby foods parents buy from grocery stores are made in a factory and they are fortified with iron and other vitamins and minerals.

"In a developing world context, where parents don't buy baby food – they make it from whatever the local available food is, like rice or lentils or wheat or corn – these are not fortified because they make them in their house," he said.

"So I came up with the idea for home fortification and this means you can take minerals and vitamins in a powdered form, put them in a little package – it looks like a package of artificial sweetener – parents have to open the package and sprinkle it onto whatever food they are using."

Zlotkin said when he presented his idea to UNICEF, he was asked to conduct research to prove that this approach would treat children with anemia, that parents would use it, that companies would agree to make the product in large volume at a low cost, and he was asked to come up with models of distribution.

"Over the next 10 years, given the fact that I work at SickKids and I'm primarily a researcher… I did research around the world to answer those questions."

The result was the Sprinkles Global Health Initiative.

With support from the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), Canadian Institutes of Health Research (CIHR) and private foundations, Zlotkin conducted research in a number of developing countries to prove the benefits of home-fortification to control micronutrient deficiencies.

He said five or six years ago, UNICEF took on the responsibility of distributing the product, "so now the sprinkles, the powdered minerals and vitamins, are being distributed to children at risk of iron and other mineral and vitamin deficiencies in probably more than 50 countries, reaching 25 to 30 million children per year" in countries across Africa, Asia and Central and South America.

He said the product is also being used as part of the World Food Program, which is a UN agency, the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, to be used in refugee camps and in emergency situations, and it is also being distributed by governments and non-governmental organizations.

Zlotkin said being recognized by the province that has been home to his family for generations is an honour.

"The Order of Ontario is the highest civilian award that can be given to someone," said Zlotkin, who in 2007, was awarded the Order of Canada, the highest civilian honour in Canada, for his contributions to improving the lives of children globally.

"My grandparents came from eastern Europe in 1903… Both my parents were born in Ontario, two of my three children were born in Ontario, and I was born in Ontario, so to be recognized by a province that I've lived in… is about the highest honour a person can receive." ■

Groups decry JDL presence at protest unrelated to Israel

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Pro-Israel groups on campus are distancing themselves from a Jewish Defence League counter-protest at York University against a student-led rally that called on the school to divest from "weapons companies."

On Feb. 4, the YUDivest Coalition, comprising groups such as Amnesty International at York and Students Against Israeli Apartheid, organized a protest to urge York to divest from arms manufacturers, such as Lockheed Martin, BAE Systems, Northrop Grumman, FLIR Systems, and Textron.

Hillel Ontario CEO Mark Newburgh said about 80 students gathered in York's Vari Hall before marching to the student centre. He said the protest was peaceful, orderly, and relatively quiet, and there was no mention of Israel specifically.

"They were chanting numerous slogans about the university divesting from weapons manufacturers. There were no chants about Israel, and there were no chants about Jewish students," he said.

He said the only allusion to Israel or Jews came from one professor who addressed the gathering in the student centre and mentioned businessman Paul Bronfman and his decision to pull his financial support from York because of a pro-Palestinian mural that currently hangs at the school.

"Other than knowing who was behind the protest, which is an anti-Israel group on campus, there was no attention brought to it. So who brought the attention to it? The JDL," Newburgh said.

According to the JDL's Facebook page, the counter-protest was organized as part of a "campaign to stop incitement to murder Jews" on campus.

JDL national director Meir Weinstein said a group of about 20 JDL protesters gathered at York's main entrance on Keele Street, waving Israeli and Canadian flags, and holding signs with messages such as "Your tax $$$ supports Jew hatred." About 35 people made their way to the student centre, where they encountered campus security.

"They [security] were saying they didn't want the JDL there," Weinstein said.

And, it seems, neither did Jewish campus groups including Hillel and Hasbara Fellowships Canada.

"I met with one of the leaders of Hasbara, one of the students leaders, and they didn't want to have any kind of protest of any sort. They weren't interested in doing that," Weinstein said, adding he didn't bother approaching Hillel.

Protesters inside York's Vari Hall

"In the past, with Hillel, we've never gotten anywhere with them."

Newburgh confirmed Hillel has no affiliation or contact with the JDL. "When the JDL showed up [Feb. 4], they showed up on their own to campus, and they were not in any way supported or working with other students or organizations," he said.

"We gathered in the Hillel lounge prior to the protest. Hillel staff gathered in Vari Hall and we worked with security to share information we were learning... We were all here in support of one thing: to ensure the safety of the students that were on campus," Newburgh said, commending campus security and police for keeping things orderly and peaceful.

Robert Walker, director of Hasbara Fellowships Canada, said Hasbara Fellows were there to observe and take photos and videos, but were instructed to avoid "confrontation for the sake of confrontation... There was no profit to be gained from getting involved with that."

Walker said it's often counter-productive for non-student groups to get involved.

"Campus matters are best managed by students. What we aim to do at Hasbara Fellowships is obviously to give them training and guidance and everything, but at the end of the day it has to be a student who is taking the lead. That's what empowerment means," Walker said.

He said "knee-jerk decisions" can undo successes that students have made.

"Much of what happens on campus happens behind the scenes... We need to play a long game when it comes to Israel activism on campus... We need to keep the big picture in mind and remember that advocating for Israel on campus isn't about waving flags for a day, but about changing minds and doing it in a strategic way." ■

Concern voiced as Canada lifts some Iran sanctions

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is urging caution as the Trudeau government shifts Canadian policy on Iran, lifting some economic sanctions while saying it's willing to discuss restoring diplomatic relations.

Iran remains a threat to Israel, the Jewish People and the international community and should continue to be confronted "through economic and diplomatic tools," CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said in an email to supporters last week.

"We remain deeply concerned about the international effort to re-engage Iran. In addition to ensuring Canada maintains an explicit focus on holding Iran accountable, we will continue to emphasize that history shows diplomacy without economic pressure has never been effective in changing Iran's behaviour," Fogel stated.

"It is near impossible to exaggerate the threat Iran continues to pose to Israel and the Jewish People globally. The lifting of international sanctions follow the P5+1 agreement on Iran's nuclear program – a deal fraught with gaps and failures that the regime will no doubt exploit – remains a serious source of anxiety for CIJA and our global partners."

Fogel urged the Jewish community, "whatever your partisan leanings... to speak out and get involved" by calling on Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion "to continue applying pressure on Iran."

Fogel was speaking after the government announced changes to Canada's economic sanctions regime against Iran.

Dion and Chrystia Freeland, minister of international trade, said they were amending Canada's wide range of sanctions "to allow for a controlled economic re-engagement... including lifting the ban on financial services, imports and exports.

"Canadian companies will now be better positioned to compete with other companies, globally," they stated.

At the same time, the government said it "continues to have serious concerns regarding Iran's nuclear ambitions and will continue to maintain tight restrictions on exports to Iran of goods, services and technologies considered sensitive from a security perspective, including nuclear goods and technologies, as well as those that could assist in the development of Iran's ballistic missile program."

"Canada's approach to re-engagement with Iran, as with any country of concern, will be based on efforts to foster dialogue, rather than on withdrawal and isolation," Dion stated. "Canada will not lower the standard to which we hold Iran accountable, particularly on its human rights record and its aggressiveness toward the state of Israel. We will use any renewed engagement with Iran as a tool to support efforts to advance human rights and regional security."

Hassan Rouhani

Canada's new policy was questioned by Paul Rotenberg, vice-president of the right-wing Toronto Zionist Council. While he supports engaging other countries, he said such efforts will prove fruitless with Iran.

"You have a regime in Iran whose values are diametrically opposed to us," he said. Iran has stepped up its public executions, it kills gays, it foments war in Syria and Iraq, it sponsors terrorism, "they don't believe in human rights. They foment terrorism all over the world."

Furthermore they don't comply with the agreements they sign, he said, adding: "Our sanctions are the only way we can express our displeasure with the way they do things, which are diametrically opposed to our Canadian ways of doing things."

A different perspective came from JSpace, a left-wing Zionist group. Spokesperson Harry Schachter said that because of the P5+1 agreement, Iran had already taken steps to dismantle its nuclear program.

"It was inevitable – and necessary – that Canada along with other countries would lift sanctions against Iran. That was what the deal was all about."

Turning to diplomatic and commercial engagement, Schachter said, "The new Liberal government prefers dialogue over isolation... The Iran story is a case where diplomacy has worked," he stated.

Tory foreign affairs critic Tony Clement and deputy critic Peter Kent said lifting sanctions "is extremely disappointing, given Canada's past track record of a principled stance against the regime in Tehran, which cannot be trusted... Iran continues to develop a ballistic missile program, even after being condemned by the United Nations." ■

jshupac@thecjn.ca

With 14 years between them, Shavey Tishler (nee Green) and Al Green were the bookends of a family of six children.

Some of Tishler's most powerful memories of her brother, who she describes as "the sweetest, gentlest man," go back to when Al was a teenager in the Canadian military and she was a child back in Toronto.

For her fifth birthday, Al, who served in Holland during World War II, sent her a pair of tiny Dutch clogs that she came to cherish, one of which she brought to Al's funeral. The other was found during the shivah by two of Al's grandchildren.

"My brother wanted me to have both of the wooden, yellow-flowered clogs," Tishler said.

Al Green, who died Jan. 22 at 92, left behind an wide and varied legacy in Toronto.

An illustrious real estate developer, sculptor and philanthropist, Green and his partners in Greenwin Construction, co-founded in the 1940s by Al's father Lipa Green and family friend Arthur Weinstock, hugely influenced Toronto's urban landscape, pioneering residential development in Don Mills and, in the 1950s, building thousands of the city's high-rise residential buildings and single-family homes, as well as some commercial buildings.

"They provided affordable rental housing that promoted the growth of Toronto, particularly where the downtown area is concerned," said David Green, the eldest of Al's five children.

In his 50s, Green, who had always pursued artistic projects in his spare time – Tishler recalled the darkroom he fashioned as a teen in the cellar of the family's Major Street home – started a second career as a self-taught sculptor, becoming the mentee of well-known sculptors Sorel Etrog and Maryon Kantaroff. Green's works are displayed throughout the city, many in buildings developed by the family business and its offshoots, as well as in the Al Green Sculpture Garden in Davisville Village.

Green also founded the non-profit Al Green Sculpture Studio and School in 2000 and the now-dormant Al Green Gallery, on Merton Street, which showcased both his work and that of fellow artists.

A notable backer of the arts and Jewish causes, Green supported the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, which named its theatre after him. He was also an active board member of organizations such as the Art Gallery of Ontario and founder of Jewish Addiction Community Services (JACS).

Al Green

"He had great sympathy for people who needed help overcoming personal struggles," David said.

Born in Toronto to immigrant parents from Poland and Russia, Green grew up in what David called the "Jewish ghetto" near Spadina Avenue and College Street and received just a Grade 8 education before joining his father and two brothers in the initial family business doing small-time contracting.

"They were doing things like repairing the brick ovens of Jewish bakeries, chimney repairs, etc.," David said.

Green's father Lipa then formed a partnership with Weinstock, who owned a tailoring factory on Spadina, and Weinstock's son-in-law Albert Latner, with whom Green and his brother Harold became active operators of the business.

"The three had wonderful chemistry. Albert's specialty was finance and politics, my father was the developer and planner, and Harold was in charge of construction. They absolutely trusted and loved each other until their deaths," David said.

After the war, Green married his childhood sweetheart, Goldie. They had five children. His second wife, Malka, died last summer.

As a father, he was extremely loving.

"My father always looked after not just us, but his extended family… We must've moved around five times when I was a kid as he became more successful, and he would bring my grandfather and many of his siblings. We often lived just a few blocks from extended family… Later, his grandchildren were the light of his life," David said.

Green is survived by five children, two stepchildren and 11 grandchildren. ■

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

Garrison Keeler famously ended his radio show, A Prairie Home Companion, with the words, "And that's the news from Lake Woebegone, where all the women are strong, all the men are good-looking, and all the children are above average." Of course, it is logically impossible for all children to be above average, and yet we implicitly know what Lake Woebegone is all about. We understand the unreal expectations it holds for itself and its children. We, who walk the glittery expanses of our cities want to bend the rules of nature and logic to meet our idealized conception of ourselves. We don't just want our children to be perfect. We want them to be above average.

Except children don't work that way.

February marks Jewish Disability Awareness and Inclusion Month. When addressing the issue of inclusion in the Jewish community, we can talk about all the work that has been done to create more ease of access for those with limited mobility. We can speak about handicapped-accessible doors and elevators. We can discuss the best ways to go about treating people who have disabilities with respect and care. These are all wonderful and encouraging developments.

Yet, these approaches are not enough. They assume that we are looking to give tzedakah – to help those who are "more needy." That is a condescending process that belittles. It is an approach that I myself often fall into, and it is wrong.

There is something crucial for us as a society – and for us as people seeking to understand God – to gain from those who might be called "atypical." We must be prepared to ask ourselves: "What spiritual lessons are we to learn from people living with disabilities? Why has God created us with differences?"

I believe that the answer to these questions resides in our human desire for uniformity and for perfection – our desire to make moulds, and our desire to fit moulds, our desire to always be perfectly in fashion and our desire to always be above average. But the existence of the atypical teaches us that our expectations for perfection are misplaced. Our moulds don't work. The cognitive patterns that we impose upon nature never fully encompass nature.

> What spiritual lessons are we to learn from people living with disabilities?

The Mishnah (Sanhedrin 37) speaks of the greatness of God in a counter-intuitive way: "When a man mints coins with one press, the coins are all the same. But when the King of Kings mints each man from the stamp of Adam HaRishon, each of them is different. Therefore, every person must say, 'For me the world was created.'" The message is clear: We can only appreciate God when we acknowledge that God mints the human coin so that every person is different. We can only appreciate God's presence in the typical when we acknowledge God's presence in the atypical.

This is the spiritual lesson of difference. When we appreciate the unique divine quality of the atypical child, we can also appreciate the typical child in her own divine uniqueness.

We, as a community, know this better than anyone. As Jews, we willfully differentiate ourselves from the norms of society. We are not just the "People of the Book," we are the people who are different because of the book. And that book tells us that there is no atypical person, because there is no typical person. Each of us is created in the image of God – each of us was specially crafted at the divine mint.

This month, let's try to break our perceptual habits. Let's try to break our prejudices. Let's try to not be "above average." ■

Teacher determined to make genocide study compulsory

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Heidi Berger has been told her campaign to make the study of genocide compulsory in all Quebec high schools is unworkable and even unwelcome, but that has only made her more determined.

Berger, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, last year created the non-profit Foundation for the Compulsory Study of Genocide in Schools. It's an outgrowth of what had been a one-woman Shoah education project that has seen her speak at more than 25 Quebec schools since 2009.

The lack of awareness she encountered convinced her that not only the Holocaust should also be taught but the broader subject of genocide. Whether it is taught – even cursorily – is largely left up to the individual teacher, Berger said. Others would like to, but feel ill-equipped, she added.

Berger, a video producer who teaches communications at Concordia University, was inspired by her late mother Anna Kazimirski, who died 10 years ago. The latter devoted years to talking to young people about her experience in the ghettos of Poland. Berger created a 50-minute video about her mother, which she shows before her talk. Some classes also read Kazimirski's memoir Witness to Horror.

Berger is feeling less lonely in her quest today. In the past year, several educators and marketing experts have joined the foundation's mainly volunteer team.

In December, she met with two Quebec cabinet ministers: Kathleen Weil, responsible for immigration, diversity and inclusion, and Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Jean-Marc Fournier, a former education minister. Berger was encouraged by the meetings' positive tone, facilitated by D'Arcy McGee MNA David Birnbaum. In January, she met Native Affairs Minister Geoff Kelley. She hopes to meet with Premier Philippe Couillard.

Since October, the foundation has been circulating a petition asking the National Assembly and current Education Minister François Blais to make genocide study mandatory as "a means to creating a tolerant and peaceful society which is accepting of all cultures and religions."

Birnbaum will present the petition in the National Assembly next month, she said.

The petition had some 2,000 signatures, in large part due to the co-operation of the Armenian community, which wants the Armenian genocide in the Ottoman Empire during World War I better known. Berger is hoping to similarly rally the Jewish community, and the foundation has written to shuls seeking support. The petition says "significant numbers of Quebec students have no knowledge of genocides, past or present, including the Holocaust, the Armenian genocide, Rwandan genocide, and the cultural genocide of our First Nations."

The foundation, sustained mainly with her own and her family's money, is convinced that reaching students will help prevent intolerance and hateful acts.

The foundation's definition of genocide is "the systematic destruction of a racial, ethnic or cultural group." It is offering model pedagogical materials that could be used in Quebec schools. A team member developed a workbook and teacher's manual for the Grade 11 Ontario Ministry of Education course "The History of Genocide and Human Atrocities." It focuses on the five stages of discrimination that lead to genocide, with the emphasis on making teens more aware of their own attitudes and behaviour.

Berger believes the best hope for getting genocide into Quebec schools is through the Grade 11 "Contemporary World" course, which explores issues such as conflict. Although history is the most logical, she doubts the subject would be covered in any such course, because scant attention is paid to World War II. Alternatively, the foundation thinks genocide could be part of the compulsory ethics and religious culture course, or English as a first or second language.

Holocaust education is compulsory in some European countries, and at least six U.S. states, Berger noted. In 2008, the Toronto District School Board introduced an optional genocide course, although not without controversy. ■

France honours former glider pilot for heroic service in World War II

plungen@thecjn.ca

Martin Maxwell remembers the night of June 3, 1944 quite well. With D-Day, the Allied attack on Nazi-occupied Europe, only days away, Maxwell and other glider pilots were summoned by Lt.-Gen. Frederick Browning, commander of I Airborne Corps and deputy commander of First Allied Airborne Army.

The general pulled no punches in his message to the men. "Some of you won't be coming back," he told them, advising them to write letters to their loved ones while they still had the chance.

It was a sobering message and good advice. On the night of D-Day, June 6, 100 glider pilots would die, along with 600 airborne troops and another 600 who were reported missing.

Maxwell knew what he'd be up against. He'd be landing an unpowered glider seven miles behind enemy lines, attacking German soldiers guarding three crucial bridges, taking on a garrison of German support troops and hoping that potential German reinforcements would stay out of the fight.

On a partially moonlit night, he landed his glider without crashing, and he, his co-pilot and the 30 commandos on board were part of the contingent that took the bridges that led to the beaches where Allied troops would land on D-Day.

Maxwell's wartime exploits have not gone unnoticed. For years, he's spoken publicly about his experiences, and recently they were brought to the attention of French officials. That led to his most recent honour. Late last year, Maxwell received a letter from Nicolas Chapuis, France's ambassador in Ottawa, informing him that he had been given the rank of Knight of the French National Order of the Legion of Honour, the highest national order in France.

The distinction "is awarded in recognition of your personal involvement in the liberation of our country during World War II. Through you, France remembers the sacrifice of all your compatriots who came to liberate French soil," the letter stated.

Maxwell displays the handsome medal and ribbon, but he still hasn't pinned it on his navy blazer. Finding room for it among his other medals might prove a bit of a problem. He expects that sometime this year, an event will be scheduled to formally award him the medal.

Martin Maxwell

> We had to land and kill the people who guarded the bridge. We couldn't use our guns. It would wake up everybody. So we used bayonets and knives.

At 91, Maxwell is still sharp as a tack, fully mobile and still hard at work at the bandages business he started back in 1952, shortly after coming to Canada.

He remains busy lecturing at schools and he's made a point of attending gatherings of veterans both in Canada and around the world, particularly in Holland, which was liberated by Canadian forces.

In addition to the action he saw in Normandy, he also fought and was wounded in Holland.

Originally from Vienna, Maxwell was born Max Meisels and changed his name so that, if captured, the Germans would not know he was a Jew.

One of five children, his family was left bereft when both his parents died six months apart of natural causes. Placed in an orphanage, Maxwell was part of a kinder-transport of Jewish children sent to England in December 1938. There he was adopted by a British Jewish family, whom he recalls with great affection.

Maxwell enlisted in 1942 and after requesting to see action, he joined the glider unit.

He describes his participation in D-Day rather nonchalantly.

"My target was the Pegasus Bridge," he said. "We had to land and kill the people who guarded the bridge, the sentries. We couldn't use our guns. It would wake up everybody. So we used bayonets and knives."

His unit held the bridge for two days until land forces moving up from the beach relieved them.

Returning to England, his unit was prepared for its next major mission, Operation Market Garden. That was the bold stroke envisioned by British Field Marshall Bernard Montgomery to land forces behind German lines, take bridges in Arnhem and open the door to a quick invasion of Germany in September 1944.

The mission failed. British forces were decimated, and Maxwell barely escaped death. He had been ordered to leave a trench and make for headquarters to tell the commanding officers that the soldiers were about to be overwhelmed. But after he'd trodden about 20 feet, a bombardment wiped out everyone in the trench. He was hurled by the shock wave into a tree and knocked unconscious. When he awoke, he was in terrible pain. His hand was close to cut in half, he had broken ribs and his hip was jutting out at an unnatural angle.

He was captured by German forces and put in the care of conscripted Dutch doctors, who nursed him back to health. While wounded, he saw a gruesome sight that attested to the barbarity of the Nazis. The Germans had hung Dutch civilians – men, women and children – from a wire in the middle of the street with a notice indicating that such was the fate of collaborators and traitors.

He survived internment in a POW camp near Hanover. His adventures continued after the war when he worked with Allied forces to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. Now he feels it's his duty to tell the world about his experiences.

As to the French honour, Maxwell said, "I'm very proud. When it's given to me, I will say I will share this medal with those who landed and never made it. They deserve it just as much, but they never lived to see it." ■

The community must support people with HIV

I found out by getting tested after I became single. It was a horrifying shock. I soon became too tired to work. My successful career in the corporate world was over. I was 43 years old, and my life was in tatters. Although I was given a death sentence, I kept some shred of hope that treatments would come along in time to change the inevitable. Luckily they did. Almost overnight I became much better. Now, 22 years later, I am in my 66th year.

In recent years, it seems that the Jewish community has followed the rest of Canadian society and has come to believe that HIV is not a problem. And if it is a problem, then at least it is not one in the Jewish community. I don't know the number of Jewish people with HIV in Canada today, but I do know that there are many people in this country who have this disease and need our help.

Many of them are women, often the most vulnerable to infection and to poor health outcomes, even though treatments are available, because they do not have the economic resources and the power within their familial relationships to protect themselves or to pay for treatments. As Jews, we should follow the tenets of our religion and protect the vulnerable in our society. Whether we're religious or not, the history of our own suffering at the hands of those who discriminate against us should be a lesson to us about how to treat others who are victims of discrimination.

I call on the Jewish community to renew its support for the cause of helping people with HIV to live healthy, productive lives. One very concrete way to do so is to encourage governments to ensure health care is equitably available to everyone in Canada, regardless of ability to pay or where in Canada they live. Another is to support social programs that ensure education, housing and employment opportunities for people who are disadvantaged, since they are at higher risk for HIV infection and poor health outcomes.

People with HIV definitely continue to face discrimination, even though we know that they pose no health risk to us whatsoever. There is still a stigma attached to this disease, maybe because of its relationship to sex and injection drug use. We blame people for getting this disease, even though they are not doing anything most people in the general population – yes, even Jewish people – aren't also doing. ■

We have a long way to go to destigmatize this disease

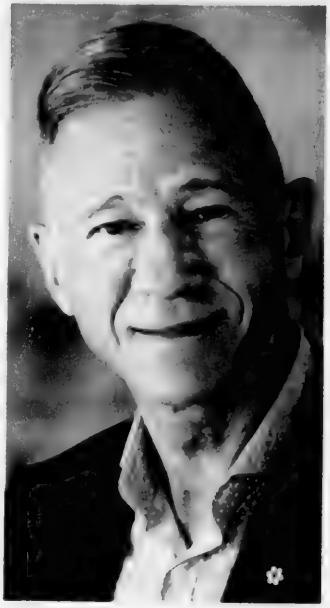
I met Larry Kramer, an inspirational activist and hero who was among the first to organize the gay community in New York and demand that governments and the pharmaceutical industry pay attention to HIV. Like many, I was deeply moved by Tony Kushner's play, Angels in America.

What have these voices taught me? They have taught me to value the concept of social justice over moral panic. I learned that if one of us is not safe, none of us is safe. HIV does not discriminate – anyone can get infected – but HIV today is more likely to seek out the marginalized and vulnerable among us. This includes people living in poverty, violent relationships, unstable housing, people with mental health and addictions, or those simply lacking education and social supports.

Social, cultural and economic determinants of health increase vulnerability to HIV. Preventing HIV transmission is not as simple as telling young people to use condoms every time they have sex when there are so many other factors that can lead to risky choices.



Ron Rosenes

> Would an older Jewish woman or man living with HIV feel comfortable disclosing their status? Would they feel comfortable disclosing a different sexual or gender orientation? Probably not.

People over the age of 50 are seeing a rise in HIV infection rates, too, because many do not believe they are at risk. As Jews, we need to ask ourselves some difficult questions. Would an older Jewish woman or man living with HIV feel comfortable disclosing their status? Would they feel comfortable disclosing a different sexual or gender orientation? Probably not. While HIV may have become a chronic and manageable infection, unlikely to be transmitted when properly treated, stigma and discrimination remain pervasive the world over. Canada is no exception.

With that in mind, the Canadian Working Group on HIV and Rehabilitation has launched a project to educate providers working with seniors on how to talk about sex, prevent transmission of HIV and other sexually transmitted infections, and meet the needs of people currently living with HIV.

We still have a long way to go to destigmatize HIV in Orthodox Jewish and other culturally conservative communities where "gay" and "HIV/AIDS" are still considered by many to be taboo. Which brings me to the notion of tikkun olam. We can heal the world starting here at home by deconstructing the myths that surround HIV and looking at it squarely in all its complexity.

The good news is that we have started down this path. It's a challenge all of us can and must accept. ■

Netanyahu worried Obama will turn against Israel

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is worried that the Obama administration will use its final weeks in office to back UN Security Council decisions and other measures detrimental to Israel, Army Radio reported on Feb. 7.

Netanyahu has therefore been trying to persuade his ministerial colleagues to approve a series of measures to boost the West Bank economy and show Israel's commitment to improving the Palestinians' lives, but has been stymied by opposition in the security cabinet by ministers including Naftali Bennett, Ayelet Shaked and Ze'ev Elkin, the report said.

Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan of the prime minister's Likud party told the radio station last Sunday morning, however, that he did not believe the Obama administration would back or fail to veto UN resolutions supporting Palestinian statehood or similar measures to impose terms.

"It's inconceivable that President Obama has any such intention," said Erdan, "given that he and his administration emphasize that the solution to the conflict requires direct negotiations and compromise between the two sides themselves."

Erdan also said he would personally back measures to improve the quality of life for the Palestinians in the territories, and that he believed Netanyahu would be able to secure majority support in the security cabinet, of which he is a member, for such measures if and when needed.

The Army Radio report, which gave no named sources, said Netanyahu's concern about possible Obama administration decisions was focused on the period between November 2016, when a new president is chosen, and January 2017, when that president takes office. Given the history of difficult relations between the two countries' leaderships, this period would constitute a brief window when the Obama administration could advance its agenda without domestic repercussions, the report said.

The Army Radio report followed hard on the heels of a similar claim the night before, broadcast on Channel 2, to the effect that U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry would visit Israel within weeks, that he would seek to restart peace talks, and that if he failed, the Obama administration might try to impose some kind of accord in the final months of the Obama presidency – after a new U.S. president has been elected, and before Obama steps down.

The U.S. State Department later that Saturday evening flatly dismissed most of the TV claims. Responding on Twitter to the Times of Israel's coverage of the Channel 2 report, State Department spokesman John Kirby said the secretary had "no plans… to travel soon to Israel. Also no plan by him to restart talks."

"Need both sides to reduce violence," Kirby added in the tweet.

Kirby did not address the claims about unilateral moves Obama might make or back in the final weeks of his presidency.

The Channel 2 report appeared to be based, at least in part, on its interview earlier Saturday with Opposition leader Isaac Herzog.

Herzog said the Obama administration "hasn't given up on the [Israeli-Palestinian] process," and that he believed Kerry "may come here soon" to try again to move things forward. Herzog, leader of the Zionist Union party, met with Kerry in Rome on Feb.2.

Herzog said many world leaders were discussing the deadlocked process and considering ideas, of which some "could be to Israel's detriment." Israel could face "decisions from all directions," he said, noting the threat earlier this month by France to recognize a Palestinian state if it fails in its planned new attempt to restart peace talks and reach an accord "didn't come out of nowhere."

If Israel didn't take the initiative, Herzog said, "we'll have an accord imposed upon us." He noted that, in the final year of the Obama presidency, the president "can do what he wants."

Herzog said he wasn't sure the Americans had yet decided what they want to attempt. But "when you hear that world leaders want to take unilateral decisions," he said, it underlined the imperative for Israel to "initiate moves that will boost its own security." ■

More haredi men in Israeli workforce, statistics show

DANIEL DOUEK
JERUSALEM

More than 50 per cent of ultra-Orthodox men are participating in the workforce for the first time in recorded Israeli history, the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) said. The new numbers marked a continuation of a 12-year trend, the CBS reported in early February.

In 1995, male ultra-Orthodox participation in the workforce hit 48 per cent and seemed to be on the rise, but then the trend reversed, dipping as low as 36 per cent in 2003. That same year, then-finance minister Benjamin Netanyahu implemented a series of welfare cutbacks designed to promote participation in the Israeli workforce. Since then, numbers have been steadily on the rise, and have finally passed 50 per cent among male haredim.

The data presented by the CBS show that haredi women have an even more impressive presence in the workforce, with 73 per cent of them working. This compares to workforce participation of 80 per cent among the general Jewish population.

The city that features the largest haredi workforce participation is Bnei Brak, where 82 per cent go to work.

The participation in the workforce among male haredim is still far smaller than in the general Jewish population, where 86 per cent of males work. Still, in an interview with Channel 2, Gilad Malach, researcher of haredi culture at the Israel Democracy Institute, called the new numbers "a historic change" and said they show that haredim have gone from being a Torah-learning society to a working and Torah-learning society.

According to Malach, the rising numbers of working haredim within Israeli society is bound to bring about major historical, sociological and cultural changes. ■

OPINION

Who or what is Israel's toughest opponent?

Sagi Melamed

"Who is your toughest opponent?" I ask my karate students. Sports in general and martial arts in particular, demand self-discipline and perseverance, willpower and hard work – and also the courage to hurt and get hit. One's opponent changes throughout one's life, except for the most challenging, which clings like a shadow: oneself.

The Torah portion Vayishlach (Genesis 32) describes our patriarch Jacob's return to Canaan, now a wealthy man with four wives, after having spent years in his uncle Laban's home. Having fled his own home for fear his brother Esau would take revenge on him for the theft of his birthright and paternal blessing, Jacob still fears Esau's wrath.

The Torah describes Jacob wrestling with a mysterious man the night before his fateful meeting with Esau. In the evening, in the midst of preparing for the meeting with his brother, Jacob was gripped with fears and anxiety. As the famous commentator Rashi wrote, Jacob "prepared himself for three things: gifts, prayer and battle."

Jacob first sends peace offerings to Esau. After the emissaries who bore the gifts returned with reports of Esau's large, mighty entourage, Jacob feared for himself and his family: "Jacob was very frightened; in his anxiety he divided the people with him… into two camps, thinking, if Esau attacks one camp, the other might still escape."

In his distress, Jacob then prays: "Deliver me, I pray, from my brother's hand, the hand of Esau. I fear he will attack me, and the mothers and children." Eventually Jacob crosses the river and, all alone, fights the mysterious "man" or "angel": "Jacob was left alone, and a man wrestled with him until dawn."

As dawn broke following the mighty night-long struggle, Jacob defeated his opponent and was granted his permanent name, which we bear to this day: "Your name shall no longer be Jacob, but Israel."

I believe that Jacob's most significant struggle was not with the mysterious man or angel, or even with Esau. Jacob was granted the name "Israel" for overcoming himself. Overcoming his anxieties. Overcoming the complex of the younger brother who received the birthright and paternal blessing only through his mother's manipulations. Overcoming his inhibitions and fears. Only once he conquered himself, was he worthy of being "our patriarch Jacob – Israel."

And from Jacob-Israel to the State of Israel. Some claim that one of the reasons for the lack of peace is that Israeli Jews fear the day when we'll have no more external enemies and will struggle only with each other – a cynical claim, yet one containing a kernel of truth.

So, while dealing with the "stabbing intifadah," with boycotts and condemnations, with internal protests and more, who or what is Israel's toughest opponent as it approaches 70?

Looking at Jewish history, we can already see that we've already been through the stage of appeasing our enemies with gifts, and through the stage of fearing catastrophe, such as the "200 days of fear" during World War II (known as the "Masada Plan") and the weeks leading up to the Six Day War, just to name a few. But is the great, true battle, the one after which we receive our permanent name, still ahead of us? If so, what might it look like?

- Closing the growing social and economic disparities?
- Defining (first, to ourselves) the permanent borders of Israel?
- Dealing with the challenge of sovereignty, after having existed for so long as a minority without sovereignty?
- Bridging the disparity between ideals and reality, between "the Chosen People" and "just the people of Israel"?
- Reaching a higher level of tolerance and acceptance of the "other"?
- Forgiving those who persecuted and tormented us?
- Translating the commandment "to till it and to tend it" (Genesis 2:15) into keeping the land and air of Israel clean?

Maybe all of the above combined, and more, comprise Israel's toughest opponent.

One's opponent changes throughout one's life, except for the most challenging, which clings like a shadow: oneself. ■

Labor party approves Herzog's unilateral pullout plan

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israel's Labor party officially adopted the proposal of its leader, Isaac Herzog, on Feb. 7 that calls for Israel's disengagement from the West Bank.

In a move considered by many to be a turn to the right for the leader of the centre-left party, Herzog last month called for the Israeli withdrawal rather than engagement in peace negotiations. Labor is one of the two parties – along with Hatnua – comprising the main opposition Zionist Union faction.

A statement from the party said that "for the first time in decades" it had "adopted a complete and comprehensive security policy outline.

"Only a separation between us will maintain a Jewish majority in Israel," Herzog said when presenting his plan to a Labor party conference in Tel Aviv earlier in the day.

An Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank would prevent the "infiltration of terrorists and strengthen security," he said.

Under his plan, the West Bank security barrier would include the major settlement blocs inside Israel.

Herzog maintained that the "vision" for peace and the two-state solution was not dead, but that "it's not going to happen tomorrow.

"Israel is at war, not going through a wave of terrorism; this is the Third Intifadah. Every day another Israeli is killed, and unfortunately, the security situation appears to be deteriorating. I'm not willing to accept – or get used to – this reality," he said.

Police enforce the disengagement from a settlement in the Gaza Strip in 2005. Labor Party leader Isaac Herzog is saying that Israel should withdraw from the West Bank. FILE PHOTO

"If the idea of disengagement dies, then so will the State of Israel – it will stop being a Jewish state. A separate state for Palestinians is Israel's only chance to remain a Jewish, democratic country with definable borders. This is in our best interests," continued Herzog.

Castigating Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as leaders with whom no progress is possible, he said: "Netanyahu and Abbas are unwilling to change the awful reality we live in today."

Herzog said both leaders rebuffed his warnings about the possibility of a third intifadah in August of last year.

"Israel does not have a functioning prime minister," he said of Netanyahu. "In a house on Balfour Street lives a man paralyzed by fear. Underneath heavy makeup and a meticulous hairdo, you'll find a frightened Netanyahu hiding."

Herzog recently proposed his plan in Tel Aviv, at the conference of the Institute for National Security Studies (INSS) ; and in Rome, to U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, where he said that separation is the only way forward with the Palestinians.

Kerry expressed interest in the plan, although the State Department said the secretary had no plans to visit the region to restart peace talks in the near future.

Shelly Yachimovich, a former leader of the Labor party who is seen as a likely rival to Herzog in the next leadership race, leveled heavy criticism at him for the proposal.

Stressing the importance of negotiations, especially during the current wave of violence, Yachimovich told Israel Radio in response that, while Abbas may not be a "lover of Zion," Israel may be facing its "last opportunity to speak with a secular, pragmatic, Palestinian leader. And we can't lose this opportunity and play into the hands of Netanyahu."

Also last Sunday, in an apparent bid to stave off a major challenge to his leadership, Herzog successfully managed to delay the party's primary elections until later this year.

During the conference, party members voted in favour of Herzog's proposal – to revisit the decision regarding the date of the leadership vote for a party meeting scheduled for May.

Sources close to the party told the Maariv news site that, at the May meeting, the vote was likely to be postponed again.

Labor has a long record of internal turmoil over party leadership, with more than 10 leadership changes in the last two decades. Herzog's move may stymie possible efforts to unseat him by Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai, Yachimovich and MK Amir Peretz, all of whom are rumoured to be considering a run for party leadership. ■

Gaza staying out of 'intifadah', Hamas claims

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

Hamas made a strategic decision at the beginning of the current Palestinian wave of violence that Gaza will stay out of the fighting, a senior official from the terror group told the Times of Israel on Feb.7.

According to the unnamed official, the Hamas leadership is not interested in an escalation with Israel on the Gaza front, and vice versa.

He also confirmed that an exchange of messages had taken place between the two sides. The messages were conveyed through Turkey and Qatar, among other countries.

Security officials told the Ynet news site that Israeli security officials were concerned that rising tensions, on both sides of the border, over Hamas's renewed efforts to tunnel under the Gaza border would cause the terror group to assume an Israeli assault was forthcoming. This could possibly lead it to attack Israel preemptively.

A senior Hamas official told the Times of Israel that Hamas does not want war and is committed to maintaining a fragile ceasefire with Israel.

Despite Hamas' recent pronouncements that its tunnels reach into Israeli territory and it is working to launch "high-quality" terror attacks against Israelis from the West Bank, the official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity: "Our stance is clear: We don't want an escalation [of violence] and we don't want war.

"We have no intention at this time or in the future to begin a war, and from our perspective that option is not on the table," the official said, urging Israel to respond with restraint to the recent Hamas rhetoric.

These reports come in the wake of a poll carried out by the Arab World for Research and Development Institute (AWRAD) and published in the Palestinian media indicating that popular support for the current wave of violence has shrunk from 63 per cent in November to 42 per cent. The poll also indicated that 54 per cent of respondents opposed the outbreak of violence in the first place, and 50 per cent believed that a third intifadah would delay plans for an independent Palestinian state.

Although Hamas has not taken a central role in the current wave of violence as it did in the second intifadah, the group has nonetheless been vocal in its support of terror attacks on Israelis.

In late December, Ismail Haniyeh, the political leader of the group in Gaza, praised those carrying out attacks and described how they had succeeded in shaking Israelis' sense of security.

"This is an intifadah for liberation and is not seeking to move forward negotiations," Haniyeh said.

Hamas also released an official statement praising the Feb. 3 attack on a group of border policewomen at Jerusalem's Damascus Gate which killed Hadar Cohen, 19.

The group's spokesman, Hosam Badran, called the attack "a turning point in the holy Jerusalem intifadah" and praised "the courage of the three martyred 'resisters' and their ability to get past all the barriers put in place by the occupation and to arrive at Damascus Gate to carry out this heroic deed which shook Israel's security." ■

Activist women say new plan banishes them from Wall

AMANDA BORSCHEL-DAN
JERUSALEM

Undeterred by the early hour and brisk Jerusalem weather, a small group of angry women met at the Western Wall on Feb. 3 for a prayer protest.

As is customary, the group of 20 or so stood together in the women's section of the Western Wall, among other women's solitary whispered prayers, and together prayed the traditional morning service, complete with phylacteries and prayer shawls.

A pair of heckling ultra-Orthodox teens climbed up the adjacent Mughrabi Bridge and attempted to sing and shout over the women's prayers. They desisted only when they got close to the rampart's top, where it is forbidden for Jews to pray or sing: the bridge leads to another, even more contested religious hotspot, the Dome of the Rock, known to Jews as the historical Temple Mount.

These women, who call themselves the Original Women of the Wall (OWOW), have been subjected to much worse– physical violence, arrest, thrown feces – in the 27 years they've been raising awareness for gender equality at the Western Wall.

So one may think that these women would be pleased with the much-lauded compromise announced after a cabinet meeting on Jan. 31, which was brokered by Jewish Agency head Natan Sharansky and former cabinet secretary Avichai Mandelblit. The agreement was also signed by the feminist prayer group called Women of the Wall (WOW).

The proposal hugely amplifies the mixed-gender prayer section at Robinson's Arch and cements access to the Western Wall for women's prayer groups. It calls for a joint entrance for all sections of prayer, further driving home the idea of parity while raising awareness for a pluralistic choice.

Additionally, the Mandelblit plan decriminalizes women's prayer at the Western Wall, including at the women's section even after the completion of the separate pluralist pavilion.

But the OWOW women – a splinter group from the Anat-Hoffman-led WOW – are among the most vehement objectors to the passage of the separate-but-equal-style pluralistic pavilion compromise. They and their international supporters don't see the government decision as a solution for them.

Publicly decrying the decision, some of these feminist activists even say they were "thrown under the bus" by the liberal Jewish movements, who co-opted their struggle for their own pursuit of prayer parity. Their pain and sense of betrayal is palpable.

For signing onto the long-negotiated compromise, WOW head Hoffman was both praised and pilloried on social media and in the press. But for the critical OWOW activists, even Hoffman's loyalty to the cause is questioned because she is an employee of the Reform movement as the leader of its legal action wing, the Israel Religious Action Centre.

Hoffman told the Times of Israel this week that the disappointment of the feminist observant Jews she calls her "sisters" is hardest to hear among the criticism of the plan.

"I want to recognize on the emotional plane that these women are sincere in their sadness and outrage. I can understand that," Hoffman said in a preface to her remarks. "They had, and we shared for a long time, a vision of equal rights for women in the women's section in the northern plaza. We wanted to sit in the front of the bus, not in the back."

But in the compromise, which Hoffman unreservedly calls a "victory," she said, women are being offered "a whole new bus, and the driver's seat, and a tank full of gas."

She said she came to the realization that, having worked on the issue for more than 25 years and seeing an increasingly extremist religious atmosphere in Israel, that the time was ripe for a compromise after a trip to the Galapagos Islands where she walked in the footsteps of Charles Darwin.

"It is not the wise who survive, not the strong survive, not the beautiful, but the one who adapts survives," said the American-born Hoffman.

Over 27 years, she said, WOW "tried every way from Sunday" to fulfil the goal of full equality in the women's section. Today, she said, "we think the best way is to share, to make the pie bigger instead of smaller."

But is this plan, which is spelled out in detail on the WOW website, really going to enlarge the proverbial pie?

Prof. Aviad Hacohen, the dean of the Academic Centre of Law and Science and an expert on religious and state law, said in a statement after the Jan. 31 cabinet decision that "separate but equal is not equal," calling it a "clear victory" for the Orthodox stance of gender separation.

"The significance of the liberal Jewish movements being given a separate plaza will undoubtedly be negligible in comparison to the main prayer pavilion. In exiling these groups to a separate prayer area, there is no state recognition for the right of the non-Orthodox movements. On the contrary, it makes fact that women's prayer and Torah reading is not part of the Jewish halachah, and that's a painful blow to their entire perception of the world," said the lawyer, who regularly takes cases relating to religion and state to the Supreme Court.

Hacohen said the decision reflects thinking from 20 years ago, and the only new spin is that the rules of Orthodox prayer "in its most conservative definition" are now binding at the main Western Wall plaza.

For Hacohen, another "slap in the face of all women who demanded full equality" is that the budget for the new egalitarian southern pavilion will not be given through the Religious Affairs Ministry. The situation is reminiscent of the case of Reform rabbis, such as Kibbutz Gezer's Rabbi Miri Gold, who are regional heads of communities but whose salaries, unlike those of Orthodox rabbis in parallel positions, are symbolically not paid through the ministry but rather through a convoluted workaround.

"The courts decided years ago that separate but equal is not equal. The new proposal eternalizes the discrimination and makes it permanent in a government decision," Hacohen said.

For Hoffman, however, this is a moot point. "The 'haredization' of the Western Wall is becoming complete as we speak. The extremists are taking over the world, and yes, this agreement will make the rabbi of the Wall in charge, and he will have a heavier hand now on modesty issues, and others," said Hoffman. "In his extremist behaviour, he will chase Jews from there to our section."

But for many longtime activists, only the Women of the Wall and liberal Jewish movements are being chased out of the Western Wall plaza.

Cheryl Birkner Mack, a former WOW board member and founder of the splinter group OWOW, told the Times of Israel shortly after praying at the Western Wall last week that while she's glad about the egalitarian plaza, "I think there must have been another way to gain recognition and rights than to trample on women's rights that have already been recognized by the state."

Women of the Wall and the splinter group are proudly "multi-denominational." But, said Birkner Mack, "when you move to an egalitarian area there will be no room for the Orthodox women," who do not wish to pray in mixed company.

"The only way in an egalitarian space for an Orthodox woman to pray is in a box," said Birkner Mack.

"Anybody who wants to go to Robinson's Arch should go. The truth is you can go to Robinson's Arch today, just as you can pray in the Central Bus Station, and I'll even support your right to do that. But don't give up the rights women have established over 27 years, at the Kotel, in the women's section. Leave us alone, don't give up our rights for somebody else's rights," said Birkner Mack.

Such criticism of the deal is gaining steam across the Diaspora.

Feminist scholar Phyllis Chesler wrote of the compromise in an op-ed in Tablet, "This is a travesty, a trick, a joke, an Orwellian use of language employed to persuade perfectly good Jews that a defeat is really a victory; that being banished is a form of acknowledgement; that capitulation to fundamentalism is actually a triumph over it; that allowing misogynists to turn the Kotel into a haredi shul is a progressive accomplishment; that being allowed to fund this travesty with Diaspora money—the haredim are on record as refusing to pay for it themselves – represents acceptance; in short, that selling one's birthright for a mess of pottage is tantamount to obtaining that birthright."

When questioned about some of this criticism, WOW leader Hoffman sighed, then took a deep breath.

"Our sisters, and I see them as sisters, opted out, because they said there is nothing to negotiate. But I said, when the prime minister offers to sit and negotiate, you go and negotiate… And if you say 'I want to stay in my pristine ideology,' then you are damning yourself to stay in a telephone booth."

Checking herself, Hoffman reiterated that these women are visionaries of a better world, and are to be admired.

"We certainly didn't throw them under the bus," she said. "I'm inviting them onto the bus, and to help us steer." ■

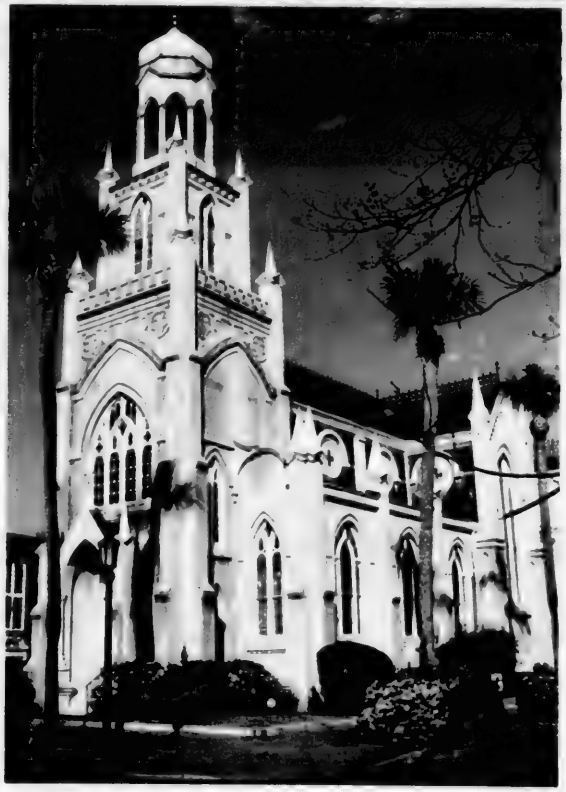
Savannah boasts the only Gothic shul in North America



Savannah's Congregation Mickve Israel. ETHAN ROTBERG PHOTOS

ETHAN ROTBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Savannah, Ga., aptly nicknamed the Hostess City of the South, is home to one of the oldest Jewish communities in the United States and a stunning Gothic-style synagogue.

Popular in great churches and cathedrals, Gothic architecture isn't a fundamental characteristic of synagogues. In fact, Savannah's Congregation Mickve Israel claims that it is the only Gothic synagogue in North America. The community's unique history and features brought more than 10,000 visitors through its doors last year to tour the sanctuary and museum.

"Our story starts in 1503," begins Bill Raffel, my guide for the short tour of the synagogue. "Is that far enough back?" He chuckles.

This is the general spirit in Savannah. It's a city with a population nearly equal to that of Abbotsford, B.C., but with a cultural and political history that makes it unique even in the United States. It's the history and southern charm that brought nearly 13.5 million visitors to the city in 2014.

Savannah was a pivotal site during the American Revolution and the American Civil War – not to mention a pivotal site for the classic American movie, Forrest Gump. It's no wonder downtown Savannah is called the Historic District.

Officially, Congregation Mickve Israel is recognized as the third-oldest in the United States, behind congregations in New York City and Newport, R.I.

The full story does begin in the early 1500s, when the major targets of the Portuguese Inquisition were the Crypto-Jews – those who had converted from Judaism to Catholicism but were still secretly practising Judaism. In 1725, a community of Crypto-Jews fled Portugal, joining a Jewish congregation in England. It was there that these members decided to set sail for a new colony being established in Georgia.

After six months aboard the William and Sarah, 41 mostly Sephardi Jews arrived in Savannah in July 1733. Among their belongings, these founding congregants brought with them a Torah and a circumcision box. It was the largest group of Jews to land in North America during the colonial days.

The nod to the past, in this case being one of the country's oldest congregations, is part of what keeps the community vibrant and growing.

Rabbi Robert Haas, who joined the Reform Congregation Mickve Israel as its spiritual leader in 2012, says the history does play a part in Savannah's active Jewish community.

"It's an iconic synagogue," Rabbi Haas says. "From the very beginning, we were welcomed here. So Savannah Jews have always felt very comfortable."

While tours have been offered for many years, they also added a museum on the second floor above the sanctuary 13 years ago. There you can see items like the original Torah brought aboard the William and Sarah from England, a letter to the congregation from George Washington following his election as first president of the United States, and even information on some of Mickve Israel's most-famed congregants like Eugenia Levy Phillips, a Confederate spy during the Civil War.

Rabbi Haas acknowledges that tourism is a big part of life at Mickve Israel. "We have this whole volunteer base of people who love history. All these events help us engage both young and old people in the community."

A fascinating aspect of the synagogue is the structure itself. Those interested in architecture will find many of the key characteristics of Gothic style. Beginning with the exterior, the building stands tall the epitome of grandeur. Inside, pointed arches and vaulted ceilings help create a light and airy interior. And of course, the use of the quatrefoil, a decorative symbol resembling a four-leaf clover found mainly in Gothic architecture, can be seen throughout the sanctuary.

"The synagogue is really stunning," Rabbi Haas says. "People do love coming here. And for the community, there's a sense of pride that's really remarkable." ■

Visiting The Synagogue

Savannah is an easy stop for those travelling between Canada and Florida for the winter. Congregation Mickve Israel is located in the Historic District, just minutes from famous Forsyth Park. Tours run from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m., and 2 p.m. to 4 p.m., lasting about 45 minutes. Visitors can also come for Shabbat services, which begin Saturday mornings at 11 a.m. More information is available online at mickveisrael.org.

How Broad City empowered the Jewish mother

Michael Fraiman

My father has explained his childhood obesity to me like this: living as migratory Jews across eastern Europe, he rarely wanted to eat the gruel his mother could afford to make, so she would physically grip his mouth open from the cheeks and spoon-feed him more calories than he ever needed.

That anecdote always struck me as deeply Jewish. It's kind of funny, kind of sad, and a testament to the hilarious results of a mother who just cares too much. I can almost hear her chastising my father's protestations: "What, you'd rather starve?"

This is the Jewish mother we know from punchlines reaching back to the Borscht Belt days. Seinfeld's won't accept the Cadillac he bought her; Woody Allen's embarrasses him celestially in Oedipus Wrecks; Howard's screams incessantly from another room in The Big Bang Theory.

"Excessive, overprotective, neurotically anxious and ever-present, the Jewish mother was a convenient scapegoat for ambivalent and hostile sentiments regarding assimilation in a new society, changing family dynamics and shifting gender roles," writes Joyce Antler, author of You Never Call! You Never Write! A History of the Jewish Mother.

Though we judge them on the surface, at their deepest, these women endear us with a hint of vulnerability: I nag because I care, I feel neglected when you don't call, I force-feed you gruel because you're too young to understand malnutrition. Over the years, that vulnerability has been transformed, generally by male comedians, into the overbearing caricature we know today.

That might explain why it took a couple of women – Ilana Glazer and Abbi Jacobson, the co-creators and stars of the critically acclaimed, and at times foul-mouthed, Broad City, whose third season debuts Feb. 17 and whose second was recently added to CraveTV – to shatter the stereotype with Ilana's onscreen mother, Bobbi Wexler.

Though Bobbi has only appeared in the fourth episode of season 2, her time onscreen is near-revolutionary. The joke is set up typically enough: Ilana and Abbi arrive at a street corner to meet Bobbi, whose own mother just died, and who wants to take the opportunity to spend a day adventuring through Brooklyn with Ilana. "Of course she isn't here," Ilana gripes. "I knew we didn't have to rush. This b—h is always late."

> It's not that Bobbi isn't a stereotypical Jewish mom ... but Ilana isn't embarrassed by her.

The thing to remember is that Glazer and Jacobson are foremost modern, young New Yorkers dealing with drugs, jobs and sex; they're explicitly Jewish, but their cultural backgrounds are as vague as Ilana's sexual preferences. They do whatever they want. So it's obvious that the flippant, free-willed millennial should resent her mother as much as any Jewish comic of the past century.

Instead, we hear the voice of Susie Essman (famous as Susie Greene from Curb Your Enthusiasm) as the camera pans up to a slow reveal of Bobbi: "I can't believe you beat me here," she says, pointing to her daughter: "This b—h is always late." With that, they break into sincere smiles and hugs.

That introductory moment completely shatters the entire Jewish mother trope. It's not that Bobbi isn't a stereotypical Jewish mom – she spends the entire episode ballistically kvetching, guilt-tripping Ilana and hunting for a good deal on Chinese knockoff handbags – but Ilana isn't embarrassed by her. Instead she literally, immediately, embraces her, and they later walk down the street proudly holding hands. Ilana isn't afraid of becoming her mother – she knows she already is. And she's proud of it.

This shouldn't be surprising for a show constantly praised for its progressive portrayal of feminism, race, class and sexuality. In a show that champions every type of womanhood, Bobbi is the winning kvetch.

In her final scene, she and Ilana are hugging again in public when a white man walks up and yells, "Hey! You're blocking the whole f—g sidewalk!" They swiftly turn and berate him, swearing furiously until he awkwardly walks away. Then the two women get quiet, hold out their arms and hug again, confessing their love in public, in defiance of the world around them. ■

THE STUBBORN MYTHS THAT REFUSE TO DIE

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash

B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 33 years

In 35 years of practice I repeatedly dispel the same myths and misunderstandings. So let us, you and I, take a few steps down the path of delusion and clear the air:

1. No, you don't have to wait a year after separation for a divorce to divide your property, resolve your support claims or settle any parenting issues. Divorce is a court Order that allows a spouse the legal right to remarry. It can be obtained one year after the date of separation in all cases. Where the other spouse has committed adultery/mental or physical cruelty it can be obtained immediately. However, irrespective of when either party obtains a Divorce Order, either spouse can seek to resolve the issues arising from the separation at any time after the parties separate. For instance, if the father of a child seeks access to his son or a mother seeks child support or either wants to divide property values then he or she can attempt to negotiate a resolution of such issues in the form of a Separation Agreement or obtain a Court Order well before the one year it takes to obtain a Divorce Order. In addition, if one is anxious to apply for a Divorce Order then it would be wise to commence a court application well before the 12 months has expired, because the court process is slow (four months in Toronto.)

2. Many people understand that unless one has a marriage contract that states otherwise, the entire value of a matrimonial home, including its pre-marital value, will be divided on a 50:50 basis irrespective of in whose name the home is registered. However, many mistakenly assume that separating spouses will share the value of only one matrimonial home, which is not true. If on the date of separation, the parties had resided in a cottage in Muskoka, a condo in Ft. Lauderdale, Florida and house in Thornhill, Ontario, then, even if all three were in the name of only one of the spouses, then all three will be "matrimonial homes" subject to division, including their pre-marital values.

3. A matrimonial home is a residence in which both parties resided on the date of separation, not any home he or she may have owned before the date of separation. So, if a spouse owned a home on the date of marriage in his or her name in which both spouses resided together then that early home is NOT a matrimonial home. This important legal fact means that on separation the spouse who owned the home on the date of marriage can deduct the equity of that home from the value of his net worth (called net family property) valued as of the date of separation. In a very simple example, say the parties were married for more than five years and the husband owns a house worth $1 million on the date of separation with no other assets or liabilities, but on the date of marriage the husband owned a home, solely in his name worth $500,000 with no mortgage. Assume that neither party had any debts or other assets on that day as well. Normally, if the husband did not have the date of marriage property then, on separation each spouse would 'walk away' with $500,000. But since the husband owned a $500,000 home on the date of marriage then he gets to deduct the value of his date of marriage "net worth" from his date of separation "net worth" i.e the $1,000,000 house before splitting it with his wife, such that she only gets $250,000, not $500,000.

Sloppy Joes will warm you on a cold winter day

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

So tell me, who is the Joe and why is he so sloppy? The best answer I could find was that the concept of a Sloppy Joe as a sandwich originated in 1930 in a small local cafe in Sioux City, Iowa, as a loose meat sandwich, courtesy of their cook, a guy named Joe.

Cold weather makes Sloppy Joe the perfect recipe for a quick dinner. The classic ones typically have ground beef, onions, ketchup, seasoning and a few other ingredients in them. Nice, simple and tasty. However, the following recipes are just a little bit different and beyond delicious. I also have a few suggestions to make your Sloppy Joes extra special.

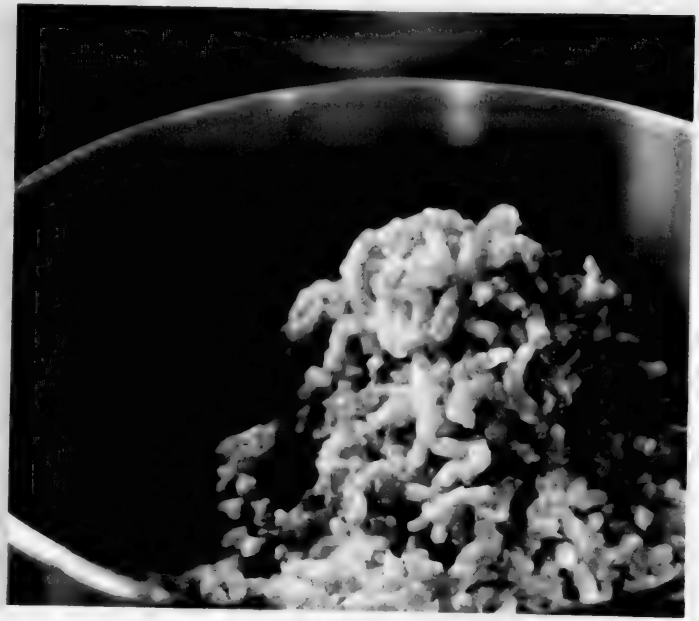
- Serve them with shredded lettuce, sliced tomato, avocado and pickles.
- Substitute ground turkey or bison for the beef.
- Add shredded carrots, sliced mushrooms or diced bell peppers.
- Serve in pita or on lettuce leaves.
- Add hot sauce, chili sauce or flavoured BBQ sauce for a different flavour.

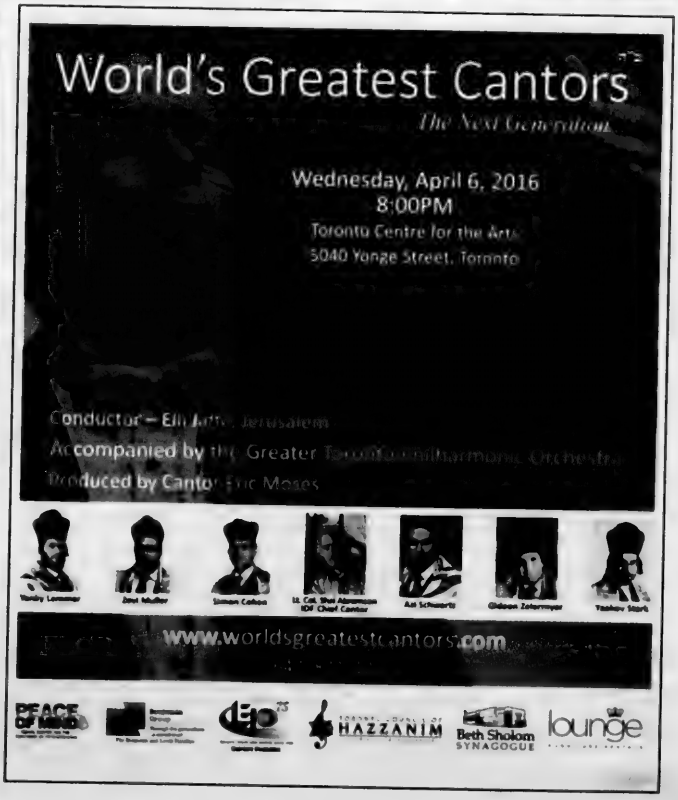
Slow cook Sloppy Joes

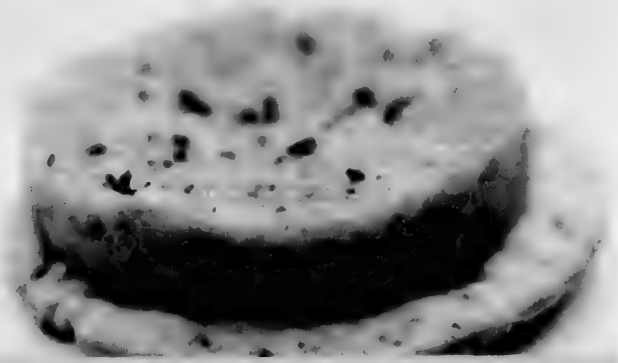
The ground beef has to be cooked before you put it in the crock pot.

- ❑ 2 lb. ground beef
- ❑ 1 onion, diced
- ❑ 1 tbsp. minced garlic
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1/4 cup water
- ❑ 3 tbsp. soy sauce
- ❑ 1 tsp. mustard
- ❑ 2 tbsp. brown sugar
- ❑ 1 cup ketchup
- ❑ 3/4 cup hickory barbeque sauce
- ❑ 10 toasted hamburger buns

In a large skillet brown the ground beef, onion and garlic. When the meat is no longer pink, drain it then put it in the crock pot. Add the salt, black pepper, water, soy sauce, mustard, brown sugar, ketchup and barbeque sauce. Mix to combine. Cover and cook on low for 4-5 hours. Serves 10.







Turkey Sloppy Joes

- ❑ 2 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1 large onion, chopped
- ❑ 1 tbsp. minced garlic
- ❑ 2 1/2 lb. ground turkey
- ❑ 1 cup cooked brown rice
- ❑ 1/2 cup water, plus more if necessary
- ❑ 1 cup ketchup
- ❑ 1/2 cup tomato paste
- ❑ 2 tbsp. cider vinegar
- ❑ 2 tbsp. brown sugar
- ❑ 8 to 10 hamburger buns

In a large skillet heat the oil, then add the onion and garlic. Sauté 2 to 3 minutes, then add the turkey. Cook, stirring constantly, until the turkey is no longer pink, about 5 to 7 minutes. Drain and then add the rice, water, ketchup, tomato paste, vinegar and brown sugar. Bring to a boil, then lower the heat to a simmer and cook until hot throughout. Serve on buns. Makes 8 to 10.

Vegan lentil Sloppy Joe

- ❑ 1 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 1 onion, diced
- ❑ 1 red bell pepper, diced
- ❑ 2 sticks of celery, chopped
- ❑ 1 tsp. cumin
- ❑ 1 tsp. chili powder
- ❑ 1 cup lentils
- ❑ 3 cups water
- ❑ 1 28-oz. can tomato sauce
- ❑ 3 tbsp. tomato paste
- ❑ 1 tsp. hot sauce
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 2 tsp. balsamic vinegar
- ❑ 6 buns

In a skillet heat the oil and then sauté the onion, pepper and celery. Cook, stirring occasionally for about 5 minutes. Add the cumin and chili powder, mix to combine and cook for 1 minute. Add the lentils, water, tomato sauce, tomato paste and hot sauce. Bring the mixture to a boil then reduce to a simmer. Cook, uncovered, for about 30 minutes, stirring occasionally. (Add more water if the liquid gets too low, below the lentils). At this point, taste the lentils, and if they are tender, add the salt and balsamic vinegar to taste. Serve with your favourite topping on the buns. Serves 6.

Note:
Most classic Sloppy Joe recipes call for Worcestershire sauce. Most Worcestershire sauce, while kosher, does contain fish and therefore is not recommended to be served with meat. I always substitute soy sauce for it in recipes that have meat in them. ■

A life devoted to the work of witnessing

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Readers of But You Did Not Come Back who are of a certain age, or who have followed French cinema, will be familiar with Marceline Loridan-Ivens, its first-time author. She made her debut in the 1961 film Chronique d'un été (Chronicle of a Summer). Directed by sociologist Edgar Morin and filmmaker Jean Rouch, it was a breakthrough cinéma vérité effort to capture the French postwar economic moment and the impact of the Algerian war.

Viewers meet Marceline as she stands holding a microphone on a Paris street and asks passersby if they are happy. The impact is stunning: Marceline's air of casual commitment and the willingness of people to consider their answer before a camera, present a new kind of filmmaking and a new way to report on the everyday.

Marceline takes a central role in a later scene, sitting with her director and a group of French students. The talk focuses on colonialism, but shifts when the director asks one of the youths if he knows the meaning of the numbers tattooed on Marceline's forearm. He thinks, he jokes, it is her phone number.

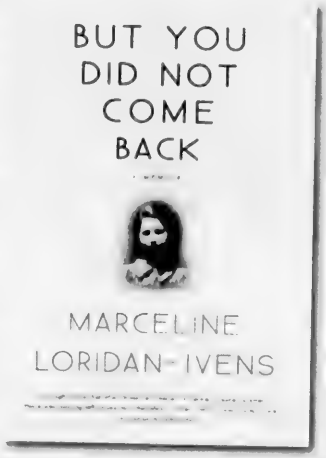
Marceline offers her compatriots a matter-of-fact interpretation of her Auschwitz tattoo, and the film veers away from France's contemporary identity toward its responsibility in wartime for helping the occupying Germans deport some 75,000 Jews to death camps.

In But You Did Not Come Back, Loridan-Ivens fills in her backstory, while also depicting her postwar struggles and successes. She was 15 years old in 1939, deeply attached to her businessman father, who had left Poland to succeed in France, if not in his effort to gain French citizenship. He and Marceline are arrested by French police as their family property in rural Bollène is confiscated to be used as a Gestapo headquarters.

The centrepiece of But You Did Not Come Back is Marceline's account of her love for her father before the war, through the deportation, even at Auschwitz, where they were in different parts of the camp. A crucial memory is of a note her father sent via another inmate. It began, "My darling little girl," and left off with his name, "Shloïme." Marceline struggles to remember the rest, but she cannot.

Loridan-Ivens' memoir is an instructive presentation of camp experience and its aftermath. Its highly personal style is in sharp contrast to books by other major figures, including Primo Levi and Tadeusz Borowski. Loridan-Ivens is closest in her presentation to another Frenchwoman – the non-Jewish Auschwitz detainee Charlotte Delbo – but Delbo used an abstract, often poetic voice to convey the abuse of bodies, the numbing work and routines, and the ever-presence of death at Auschwitz.

Loridan-Ivens is a witness as hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews are funnelled to their deaths, and she is a witness, too, of the arrival of the inhabitants of the Lodz Ghetto.



But You Did Not Come Back: A Memoir of the Holocaust
Marceline Loridan-Ivens

Translated from the French by Sandra Smith. Penguin

> I saw them walking up to the gas chambers. I thought that relatives I didn't know, my aunts, uncles, cousins, grandparents, were probably among them. You were from Lodz. I kept working.

The inmates' involvement in the murderous projects of the camp continues to haunt her: "I saw them walking up to the gas chambers. I thought that relatives I didn't know, my aunts, uncles, cousins, grandparents, were probably among them. You were from Lodz. I kept working. I struck the ground without looking around me, with no memories, no future, exhausted by not having enough to drink or eat; I dug the ditches where the bodies of 50 distant relatives from Lodz would burn."

Upon her return to postwar France, her father dead, Marceline is unmoored but open to her existential challenge: "Little by little, I allowed myself to be carried along by my generation, its chaos, and I felt what it was like to be young. I wanted to make something of myself, without really knowing what... to become part of a story that was greater than my own, discover the world, learn, laugh a little, join in the endless discussion in the bistros of Saint-Germain-des-Prés."

An important career as a filmmaker with her second husband leads to films on revolutionary movements, including Maoist China. In 2003 she made The Birch-Tree Meadow, in which the French actress Anouk Aimée stood in for herself in an enacted return to the remnants of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

But You Did Not Come Back closes on an unforgiving note, as Loridan-Ivens and a fellow survivor muse over a dark question: "'Now that we are approaching the end of our lives, do you think it was a good thing for us to have come back from the camps?'

"'No, I don't,' she replied, 'we shouldn't have come back.'"

The answers two aging friends provide, like much of Loridan-Ivens' memoir, pushes our understanding of the war and its aftermath into new territory. ■

His work fills need to be creative, actor/playwright says

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Playwright Alex Poch-Goldin's first big hit, This Hotel, about a man who goes on a journey through his subconscious after coming home to find his wife with another man, will be remounted just north of Toronto.

A surreal fantasy, This Hotel was written for the 1999 Toronto Fringe Festival.

"We didn't have a play, so I started scouring my journals. I found a premise of a dream and I used it for a launching pad to explore the play," he said. In This Hotel, after his wife's rejection, the character Lester "goes into a place in his mind where he visits a hotel, and a bellhop emerges who is a kind of shape-shifting guide who takes him on a tour of his subconscious and takes him through a series of rooms," Poch-Goldin said.

"He encounters people who are in one sense aspects of his subconscious, but also other tenants of the hotel who have suffered some kind of love loss or love pain."

This Hotel sold out when Theatre Passe Muraille presented it in 2000, and it received six Dora Award nominations. It opens in Barrie, Ont., on March 3.

Alex Poch-Goldin

Poch-Goldin, a busy actor who's appeared in films, plays and on television, has been writing since he was a child growing up in Montreal.

"When I wasn't working as an actor, I still needed to be creative, so I found an outlet in playwriting instead of waiting for the phone to ring," he said.

He's the author of The Right Road To Pontypool, about a resort in Pontypool, Ont., where Toronto Jews vacationed from 1916 to the early 1960s. He won the 2002 Toronto Jewish Playwriting Award for his play Yahrzeit, which explores conflict and the hard choices we must make to find peace in our lives and in our world. Translated into German, Yahrzeit toured Germany, Austria and Switzerland.

Last summer, Poch-Goldin's play The Bad Luck Bank Robbers, about a daring 1961 daylight robbery of the Toronto-Dominion Bank in Havelock, Ont., was sold out for its eight weeks at 4th Line Theatre in Millbrook, Ont. The show is back at 4th Line this August.

Poch-Goldin is also the author of the libretto for Against Nature/À Rebours, a music, dance and theatre piece about a man who turns his back on society, to be presented by Coleman Lemieux & Compagnie in Toronto this May.

For his next acting job, though, he won't be waiting for the phone to ring. He's got a gig lined up playing a waiter in Soulpepper theatre's production of Arthur Miller's Incident at Vichy, to be staged in May and June. The play is about Jews who have been brought in for interrogation in France during the Nazi era.

"It has to do with individual culpability and responsibility in the face of fascism and terror – what we can do to help instead of just thinking about ourselves," Poch-Goldin said.

Pondering his two-pronged career, Poch-Goldin said that "as a writer, the work lasts. It's there, it can be produced." He said an actor's work exists only in the minds of the people who see the performance. "It's a different thing than being a playwright, where there is something tangible that is a blueprint where people can tell your story from when you're gone." ■

Women-only Israel tour named after Diamant bestseller

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Red Tent Tours, Paula Perlmutar Oretsky's women-only tour to Israel, fills two niches: it explores the country from what Oretsky calls a "woman's point of view" and highlights both Israel's Jewish and non-Jewish elements.

"On my last tour," the 62-year-old retired teacher from Toronto said, "I had women asking if we were going to plant a tree. I said, we're not going to be doing those typical things."

Five years ago, Oretsky launched Red Tent Tours, named for Anita Diamant's 1997 bestseller, and has co-ordinated and led a tour nearly every year since, with another planned for May.

The tour is secular, non-denominational and geared to women of all religions, ages and backgrounds; most range from 50 to 80 and come from Canada, but Oretsky has had participants from the United States and Australia.

While it typically draws women who have never before been to Israel – for some of the non-Jewish past participants, visiting Israel was something on their "bucket list" – the 10-day, cross-country trip has also attracted women who've been to the country multiple times.

The itinerary includes a mix of urban exploring like learning about the changing landscape of Tel Aviv and Jaffa, visiting historical sites like Beit She'an and Caesarea, where the group is given a private tour of a museum of Spanish surrealist art, and hiking at national parks.

"I base the trip on my interests and my interest are varied. I like the antiquities, the arts, the outdoor component and I like to eat," Oretsky laughed.

Where Red Tent really diverges from other Israel tours is in its focus on meeting face to face with women both Jewish and Arab and getting a feeling for where they live and the experiences that have shaped their lives.

For example, a staple is a visit to an Arab town in the Galilee region called Deir al-Asad, where the group prepares and eats lunch with a woman who runs a catering business, and listen to her story of being a business owner and role model to young women in her community.

Another stop is to the home of a Druze woman in the Golan Heights, where the group eats lunch in a living room overlooking Syria, and hears her story of how her children came to work as professionals in Israel.

The group also meets with Oretsky's daughter, a member of the Labour Zionist youth movement Habonim Dror, who made aliyah and lives collectively with a group of others from the movement; she shares her perspective on making aliyah, Oretsky explained.

On the next tour, scheduled for May, the group will meet with a Bedouin woman and Oretsky is also hoping to arrange a meeting with women from the multi-denominational feminist organization Women of the Wall.

Oretsky said she tries to keep the tour as politically neutral as possible. "It tends to lean a little bit left because of who I am, and because we talk on the trip of co-existence [between Jews and Arabs]. There's also a female tour guide who's with us the whole trip and she and I are on the same page in terms of looking for peace through co-existence."

Oretsky has strong personal ties to Israel. At 21, she met an Israeli while traveling in Europe and they moved to Kibbutz Kineret, on the Sea of Galilee, where she taught English for several years.

After they divorced and she moved back to Toronto with her young son, she chose to send him to Bialik Hebrew Day School due to its Labour Zionist roots, and later sent both her children to Camp Gesher.

For Oretsky, Red Tent Tours is about sharing her love of Israel with others and countering some of the misconceptions about the country.

"I'm bothered by the negative political and editorial opinions and I think it's important to show people what life is like in Israel," she said, noting, "I didn't want to show only Jewish Israel. A lot of Jewish women have already been exposed to Jewish Israel and my tour is unaffiliated [with any organization], so why limit it? There were women on my trip in past who'd never met a Muslim woman. To meet a Muslim woman who embraced them – literally – it opened their eyes." ■

Red Tent Tours runs this year from May 12-26, and includes an excursion to Petra, Jordan. For more information visit israeltoursforwomen.com

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

A matter of trust

Dr. Michael Gordon

What does the Volkswagen diesel emissions travesty of deception have to do with medicine? It was a massive abrogation of trust. And when the news hit that a well-respected Toronto-based academic physician was dishonest in her reporting of important research results that could potentially negatively affect patients – that too was a massive abrogation of trust.

For those of us in the practice of medicine, the vast majority of us have an overriding understanding that our prime concern is the well-being of our patients. That does not mean we are all paragons of virtue, knowledge and blemish-free personalities. Physicians are people who have undertaken the practice of medicine – with its long and illustrious history and legacy. That being said, it is an everyday undertaking and sometimes a monumental challenge to make sure that we fulfil our duties and obligations to our patients and, no less importantly, to ourselves and to our profession.

There is a collective duty to the profession that each physician is expected to fulfil. In almost all jurisdictions, it is overseen in a regulatory fashion by our colleges of physicians and surgeons. We are duty-bound to heed their policies and directives, but the innate commitment that each physician must internalize is what keeps the vast majority of us reputable and caring practitioners.

It is very common these days – maybe it has always been so, but I suspect not –for physicians and the health-care system to be criticized by individual patients and by the media. There is something about medicine that grabs the media – on the one hand, the ever-so-popular TV shows like Grey's Anatomy or the remote Chicago Hope and on the other, the newspaper stories about one hospital or nursing home or errant physician after another causing an affront to the sensibilities of the public.

When it comes to physicians, I believe the vast majority of us want to do right by our patients. The question for those in leadership positions becomes how to build on the intrinsic desires of physicians to fulfil their natural and professional wishes and inclinations to serve their individual patients and the general public. It is not always easy: sometimes, for example, when political forces and circumstances mount, as periodically happens, physicians generally feel that there is pressure on them that might ultimately compromise not just their personal well-being through funding decisions, but ultimately their ability to serve the needs of their patients.

It is not that physicians do not know the realities of economic constraints – such things are part of all of our lives, whoever we are – it is just that when making medical decisions, it is sometimes hard to factor in relative costs and financial impacts, when at the end of that equation is a patient and sometimes in the world of aging, the family of that patient.

Hope springs eternal. It was a bit refreshing although understandably very political, that during the recent election campaign, the parties vying to replace the Conservatives promoted a substantial agenda for the burgeoning aging population. Even though the health-care portfolios sit within the provinces, maybe, just maybe, this time around and with a new government, there will be a translation from political promises to actual investment through the provincial channels in a way that those physicians and other health-care providers, and the facilities and programs that serve the older population and their supporting families will get the help they need to promote their well-being.

And maybe, within that complex interaction with practising physicians, the ability of each and every one of them will be supported and promoted, in keeping with their long legacy of dedication and most important, trust. ■

I'm currently enrolled in a master of pastoral studies at the University of Toronto's Emmanuel College, which trains future leaders of the United Church. Studying and discussing religion as the only Jew in the room has been interesting, challenging and entertaining. One of the key differences I've noticed is how freely my classmates speak about God and their relationships with God – what we call theology. I've noticed that Jews are more reluctant to articulate our core beliefs about God and often have a less personal relationship with God. We say things like "Baruch HaShem – thank God," but rarely discuss what that means for us. We're much more inclined to discuss traditions or minutiae of Jewish law.

Theology literally means "words or talking about God." So, let's use our parshah to talk about God.

Both this week's Torah reading and Haftorah deal with our relationship with God and ways of accessing God. They explore where and how to communicate with God, as well as how to show gratitude, love, joy, regret and remorse. The Tabernacle as well as Solomon's Temple were built by people who were given divine wisdom to build them as a way of creating a dwelling place for God among the Children of Israel.

In Trumah, we read: "And let them make Me a sanctuary and I shall dwell among them" (Exodus 25:8). Many commentaries note that the word for dwell used here – shachan – should be read as a point of access and isn't meant to be taken literally. By creating this space of worship, we're establishing a framework in which we direct our hearts and minds to God. God is, of course, not limited to only being in this one physical space.

Upon completion of the Temple, King Solomon asks: "Would God truly dwell on earth? Behold, the heavens and the highest heavens cannot contain you, and surely not this temple that I have built" (1 Kings 8:27).

Let's each find a moment to reflect this week on why, when and where we access God. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"From inside and outside shall you [gold] plate it" (Exodus 25:11). The Gemara, Yoma 72b, derives from this that a scholar's interior must equal his facade.

Rabbi Moshe Pfeiffer, a Talmud lecturer in Miami, Fla., observes that there is some degree of equivocation regarding the pedagogical application of this principle. The Gemara, Berachot 28a, records a dispute between Rabban Gamliel and Rabbi Elazar ben Azariah on whether to initially ban students from entering the house of study unless their interiors already equal their facades. Rabbi Pfeiffer believes that the more accommodating approach is based on Pesachim 50b: "a person should always be occupied in Torah and mitzvot, even for ulterior motives, because from ulterior motives, sincerity will ultimately emerge."

Rabbi Pfeiffer suggests that this debate parallels the duelling accounts on how the Ark was gold-plated. The Talmud Yerushalmi (Shekalim 16b), as presented in our manuscripts, reports that the Ark was first plated inside and then outside, reflecting the high admission standards of Rabban Gamliel. However, Rabbi Yisrael Ashkenazi of Shklov, in his Taklin Chadetin commentary, records a Yerushalmi manuscript with the reverse sequence, representing the possibility of teaching a hypocrite in the hope of rehabilitating him. Rashi on Exodus 25:11 champions the latter approach.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, in his posthumously published Darash Mosheh, offers a related message. Yoma 21a says the Ark miraculously occupied no space in the Holy of Holies, whereas Bava Batra 14a describes how the Ark was filled to internal capacity with the Tablets (and, according to one opinion, the sefer Torah). This paradox illustrates that a scholar should internally saturate himself with Torah, yet refrain from taking up space in the outside world (i.e. have a "zero carbon footprint"). ■

In February, we're inundated with images of chubby, baby cherubs holding bows and arrows. Who wouldn't want to be targeted by these cherub-cheeked baby boy angelic figures?

But in this week's Torah portion, we read of the design of the Ark of the Covenant and the two cherubs on the lid. They're not cute and chubby, nor are they gendered. They look fierce, and we wouldn't want them targeting us for anything.

Cherubs first appear in Genesis. After humanity is exiled from the Garden of Eden, God is concerned we'll return there to eat from the Tree of Life. Mortality was just introduced into Creation, and God doesn't trust that we'll undo mortality by eating the fruit of eternal life. To prevent us from returning, God places cherubs and fire at the entrance. In prophetic literature, cherubs are multi-faced, multi-winged creatures with human hands under their wings. They interact with God and do His bidding, but they're never depicted as our friends or guardians.

In fact, the further we can stay away from cherubs, the better off we'll be.

During the Renaissance, cherubs became confused with images of putti, who are symbolic of innocent lost souls. These depictions were of children or infants, always male and chubby. There's also record of Cupid in ancient mythology. Cupid is the son of Venus and Mars, the gods of love and war. Cupid is armed for the warfare of love with a bow and arrow. He's portrayed as a putti – as an infant, chubby, male with large cheeks.

The February depiction of cherubs is the result of mistakes and confusion. It's now a secular portrayal of a modern holiday for lovers. Our texts give a true depiction of cherubs. Fashioned for the top of the Ark, facing each other with their wings overstretched toward each other, they're frightening. When God would speak, the Divine Voice was heard from the space between the cherubs – the Voice of God speaking from a void guarded by fierce angels – beyond our comprehension and sensory experiences, and a glimpse of the complexities of creation. ■

Novel's backdrop is historic fight for better work conditions

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In 1931, during the Great Depression, the downtrodden and overworked factory workers in the Toronto garment district near Queen Street West and Spadina Avenue rose up to strike for shorter hours, safer working conditions, decent wages and recognition of their union.

Award-winning author Anne Dublin has written a novel based on real events that happened during the strike, titled 44 Hours or Strike! published by Second Story Press.

In her book, Dublin uses labour history to present a realistic view of the hard-fought battle that the immigrants faced in the pre-World War II years.

She brings together many issues faced by Jews in the 1930s, including the growing distrust and resentment toward immigrants, anti-Semitism, poverty, as well as family love and inter-racial dating.

The workers are also blamed for the difficulties everyone is facing, especially the eastern Europeans who might have communist ideas.

Teenage sisters Rose and Sophie Abramson become active and join the picket line in the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union (ILGWU) strike against the sweatshop owners.

After a fight with the authorities on the picket line, Rose is imprisoned. Her 14-year-old sister, Sophie, is left to care for their ailing widowed mother while continuing to spend her days protesting on the picket line in the freezing Toronto winter.

Dublin describes the horrific conditions at the Mercer Reformatory for Women and the effects on Rose of the isolation and abuse in prison.

The question becomes, "Will they be able to continue to fight for a cause they once so strongly believed in?"

Dublin's parents were Holocaust survivors who came to Canada in 1948.

"Because we were very poor, there was no money to buy extras," she says. "I discovered the public library and that opened up a whole new world for me."

A former teacher-librarian, Dublin taught English and French in elementary schools.

She is the author of 10 books – biographies, historical novels and short stories. She is a sought-after speaker. Her book will appeal to both students and adults. ■

Mordechai Kedar on ISIS, Iran and 'Palestinian emirates'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Prof. Mordechai Kedar is a lecturer on Arabic and Islamic studies at Bar-Ilan University in Be'er Sheva. Fluent in Arabic, he served as a lieutenant-colonel in the Israeli Defence Forces' intelligence branch. He is a frequent commentator on the politics of the Arab world and in 2008 appeared on Al Jazeera, where he sparred with the host and asserted the Jews' historic claim to Jerusalem. Kedar was in Toronto last month as part of a month-long North American speaking tour. In addition to addressing university students and synagogue congregations, he sat down for an interview with The CJN.

Your topic at Beth Tikvah Synagogue was on Israel and its enemies. Given the disarray in the Arab world, isn't Israel's strategic position pretty good right now?

We have peace with Egypt and Jordan and Syria as a state is dysfunctional, so it's also not anymore on the list of active enemies. Also we have Hezbollah to the north. This is one circle of enemies.

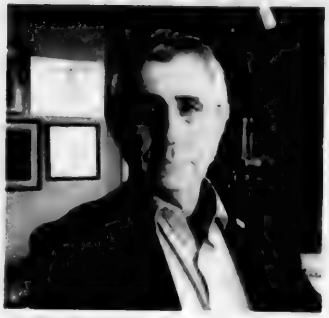
In the second, wider circle in the Middle East, I would count Iran as a strategic threat to Israel, because of its nuclear program, which I believe was never abandoned. So these are the enemies which are states. However, in the Middle East, there are non-state players – terrorist organizations like Hamas and the Islamic State (ISIS). Since the lead in the Arab world has been transferred from governments to organizations, we see organizations today also posing also a threat to Israel.

Do these non-state players threaten Israel existentially?

No, terror cannot topple a state. But terror can make life bitter and hard. This is what we've seen during the last few months. And this brings us to the third kind of threat, the knife intifadah, the stabbings of Jews. This is a threat against the Jewish part of Israel by people who are working within us. Since Israel is not an apartheid state, Arabs can go wherever they like, whenever they like – to work, to cinema, to restaurants – because they are citizens.

Some take advantage of this. They come to the workplace and stab Jews. This is a threat, because it makes everyone a potential stabber. How do you tell one from the other?

This phenomenon no doubt comes from the Islamic State, which turns the use of a knife or cleaver into an art in order to terrorize infidels. Clips of beheadings are uploaded to the Internet. People watch them, are impressed and take the knife in order to do it to the Jews.



Prof. Mordechai Kedar

> The Iranians were caught cheating time after time over the last 18 years of negotiations. They never implemented what they committed themselves to.

Is ISIS trying to infiltrate Gaza, take over and supplant Hamas?

This is ISIS' strategy not only in Gaza. It's in many places. So far, around 20 organizations all over the world, from the Philippines in the east all the way to the Sahara in the west, have pledged allegiance to the Islamic State. Gaza is one of the places where the Islamic State tries to convince Salafist groups to pledge allegiance to them. Gaza is no different than Nigeria, where Boko Haram has already pledged allegiance to ISIS. Sinai became the Sinai District of the Islamic State.

It doesn't stop with these organizations. In many states in the world, there are individuals who fall in love with the Islamic State, with the methods it employs and with the goals that drive it. San Bernardino, the Boston Marathon, Ottawa, Times Square, Paris, Toulouse and Sydney are only a partial list of places where individuals are walking in the footsteps of the Islamic State.

Does that suggest that what's happening in Israel, where people are attacked with knives, is something we can expect in North America and the rest of the western world?

It's already happening. A few months ago, a Muslim employee slaughtered his boss at work in France. In London, a soldier was beheaded while walking to his workplace. In Oklahoma, there was a case of beheading by a Muslim. So the methods of ISIS are being exported, mainly by social media, in clips that everybody can watch.

So what do you make of the European decision to bring in tens of thousands of Syrian refugees? Canada also is going to bring in 25,000.

Well they have to be checked very carefully. Children definitely deserve to be protected, as do women in most cases and old people who are fleeing from death. However, young adults, or people 18 to 35, should be checked very well.

What should the Jewish community's attitude to the Yazidi people be?

We Jews should view the Yazidi genocide by ISIS as if it was perpetrated against us, no less. After the Yazidis, the jihadists will go after the Christians, the Alawis, the Shiites and the Jews.

We are in line, so we have to step up now, before it comes to our necks. The Jewish community should do what it can to save Yazidi girls from slavery, to stop the genocide and to push forward the establishment of a political unit, whether an autonomous area or independence for the Yazidis, so they can defend themselves.

Let's talk about the U.S.-Israeli relationship. Is it at a particularly low point now?

There are some levels of co-operation between Israel and the United States. On the level of intelligence co-operation, I think the relations are as usual.

The economic relations are excellent.

When it come to political issues, there are two big differences between the Obama administration and Israel. The first is about the deal with Iran. Israel, from the left to the right, considers it an existential threat. The Obama administration views the deal as something that will bring more stability and peace to the world, and everyone will sit around the fire and sing Kumbaya.

Another issue is a Palestinian state. In Israel, even the left is afraid that a Palestinian state, especially in Judea and Samaria, will turn into another Hamastan, either by elections or by military coup d'etat. So Israelis on the left and right assume that this will be the fate of a Palestinian state, and that all those who preached to us, day and night, to create a Palestinian state will not come to chase Hamas out after they take this state over, and we'll be stuck with the problem.

If Hamas controls the West Bank, it will be able to target 80 per cent of the Jewish population of Israel, with short-range missiles. The longer range missiles will arrive everywhere, including Haifa harbour. This might paralyze Israel totally, so this is an existential threat.

Let's talk about your plan for the West Bank. You've written that the Palestinians aren't a nation requiring a nation-state, but rather are divided into tribal groupings.

There is a Palestinian nation, just like there's a Syrian nation, Iraqi nation, Libyan nation, Sudanese nation: all are imaginary creations of the West. On the ground, these states are highly fragmented to tribes, ethnic groups, religious groups and sectarian groups that never constituted a nation. The Palestinians are the same. The fact these states failed to replace people's loyalty to these traditional frameworks is the source of the problems we see in the Middle East today.

Because if there were a Syrian nation, they wouldn't kill each other the way that they do. If there was an Iraqi nation, they would live in peace with each other. If there was a Libyan nation, they wouldn't slaughter each other.

The Palestinians are highly divided into clans. Not only that, they don't marry each other. The only way to achieve peace and stability in the Middle East, including with the Palestinians, is to create states that would be socially homogeneous, like the Gulf emirates, Kuwait, Qatar, Dubai and Abu Dhabi, where everyone is from one tribe – the Nashashibis in Jerusalem, Barghoutis in Ramallah, Erekat in Jericho, Masri in Nablus. Since tribalism in the Middle East is still alive and kicking, we should follow it rather than negate it. That's why the only plan that can bring stability to the Palestinians is eight Palestinian emirates. This will give them stability and prosperity, and give us security.

What do you think will happen with Iran? Will it get a nuclear weapon?

The Iranians were caught cheating time after time over the last 18 years of negotiations. They never implemented what they committed themselves to. I think nobody would buy a used car from them, so why should someone in their right mind buy from them a promise while they are acting day and night to undermine the Middle East, in Yemen, Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and Gaza. Where they are responsible for the bloodbath in Syria and Iraq. When they could not care less about human life and they consider all those who negotiated with them to be wine-drinkers and swine-eaters who are worth nothing compared to true believers like themselves.

I don't believe even one word they say and sign. They are compulsive liars who hide behind the idea of taqiya, the Shia concept of deception, which is a necessity to survive in a hostile environment. ■

What will it take for a Muslim-Jewish Nostra Aetate?

Backstory

JIMMY BITTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

As part of a series of gestures to mark the 50th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council's declaration entitled Nostra Aetate, or "In Our Time," last month, Pope Francis paid a historic visit to the breathtaking Great Synagogue of Rome. There, the leader of the Catholic Church spoke about the remarkable advancements in Jewish-Christian relations, laid a wreath at the location where the Jews of Rome were rounded up by the Nazis, and laid another wreath to commemorate Stefano Gaj Taché, the two-year-old Jewish boy who was murdered on Oct. 9, 1982, when five PLO terrorists shot at families leaving the synagogue after the afternoon Shabbat service.

Nostra Aetate is revolutionary in the otherwise dark history of Jewish-Christian relations because it repudiates the age-old charge that Jews are collectively responsible for the death of Jesus. But, what inspired this revolutionary change in Catholic attitudes toward Jews and Judaism? Eminent philosopher and scholar Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks argues that, "It took the Holocaust to bring about Nostra Aetate."

From the period of early Christianity through the ensuing centuries, Christians cultivated potent anti-Jewish attitudes. Spearheaded by the early Church fathers, Christianity came to historically understand itself as the religion that God intended Judaism to be. As for the Jews themselves, they were judged eternally cursed for being Christ killers. In one polemical homily, Church father John Chrysostom (354-420), referred to the Jews as dogs, beasts and the vilest of animals. The synagogue, he stated, is "worse than a brothel," before concluding with a decree that "it is the duty of all Christians to hate the Jews." Later, Martin Luther rekindled anti-Jewish attitudes in his 1543 treatise The Jews and Their Lies. Therein, Luther advised Christians to burn down synagogues and Jewish schools.

In the 20th century, the Nazis found fertile ground and willing collaborators for the systemic, state-sponsored persecution and murder of six million Jews. The vitriolic writings of Christian leaders were resurrected by the Third Reich and became a prevalent motif of Nazi propaganda against the Jews.

Today, the major theological issues that have served to separate Jews and Christians throughout time have not been resolved. And yet, Christian attitudes toward Jews since World War II bode well for reconciliation. Now, dialogue, rather than violence, is the model of Christian-Jewish relations. With Nostra Aetate, Christianity adopted the modern virtue of religious tolerance and officially delegitimized any Christian theologically inspired hatred of Jews.

In our time, the very urgent question is, can the mostly violent model that has plagued Muslim-Jewish relations be similarly replaced with one of dialogue?

Radical Islamism is on the march, and terror groups like Al Qaeda, ISIS, Hezbollah and Hamas have cast a very dark shadow over Jewish-Muslim relations. The world watches in horror as jihadists strike every continent and Palestinian children are radicalized to view the murdering of Jews as a religious duty. There is no doubt that modern Islam is in a crisis.

In 2004, under the patronage of King Abdullah of Jordan, over 200 Muslim scholars issued a declaration entitled Amman Message, which denounced radicalized renditions of Islam. The document stressed that the core values of Islam are compassion, tolerance, acceptance and freedom of religion. However, any momentum that came from the much anticipated declaration seems to have faded far away. Certainly, we have yet to witness the peaceful Muslim majority produce an equivalent to Nostra Aetate.

Judaism, Christianity and Islam each share a common Abrahamic tradition and belief in a single God. The monotheistic similarity allows for a meaningful discourse between the three great religions. The Christian world seems to now acknowledge this and has taken significant steps toward reconciliation. What will it take for the Muslim world to do the same? ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

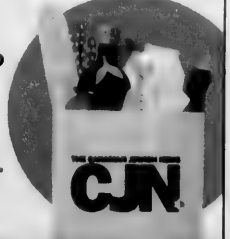
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.



CIJA

CIJA Welcomes New Board Members

We are privileged to welcome Jonathan Goldbloom, Dr. Mario Silva and David Spiro who bring a wealth of talent and a deep commitment to Canadian Jewish advocacy.

JONATHAN GOLDBLOOM

is a communications consultant with a focus on crisis and issues management. He recently worked on Bob Rae's campaign for Liberal Party leadership. Mr. Goldbloom was a member of CIJA's Senior Cabinet in Quebec and of the CIJA Quebec Regional Committee Board of Directors.

DR. MARIO SILVA

is an author and international legal scholar who has had a distinguished career as an elected parliamentarian and leader of civil society. He was appointed by the Government of Canada to serve as the 2014 Chair of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance.

DAVID SPIRO

is a Toronto attorney who served as the Board Chair of CIJA's GTA Local Action Committee. He has also served on the boards of Jewish Federations of North America, Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA, and Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Nominations to the CIJA Board are guided by an independent process, managed by a Nominations Committee that assesses the background, specific skills, experience, and other relevant qualifications of prospective Directors and submits a list of candidates to the national CIJA membership for consideration. CIJA benefits enormously from the knowledge, experience and passion of its Board members.

We extend our sincerest thanks to David Fogel, Lisa Gamson, and the Hon. Sheila Copps, PC for their distinguished service to CIJA and to the Jewish community. Though they will no longer serve as Board members, their contribution to CIJA will continue to positively impact Canadian Jewry.

Big Bang star gives Piers Morgan a show, and former Floyd frontman weighs in

Mayim's immodest moment

Actress Mayim Bialik, an advocate of her Orthodox faith and modesty, put on quite a show for Piers Morgan on the Late Late Show with James Corden Feb. 8. The Big Bang Theory star declared herself a feminist before turning her back to the camera and pulling down her dress in front of Morgan. Bialik was defending actress Susan Sarandon, whom Morgan had criticized for wearing a low-cut outfit while presenting an award at the Screen Actors Guild Awards Feb. 6. Bialik has been outspoken about the challenges of maintaining faith and modesty in Hollywood.

Waters decries 'bullying' at York U

Ex-Pink Floyd frontman Roger Waters weighed in Feb. 9 on a controversial mural at York University, saying criticism of Israel isn't anti-Semitic, while applauding students and faculty for "standing up… to bullying." He accused businessman Paul Bronfman, who pulled funding from York over the issue, of trying to use "economic muscle" to censor the painting. Palestinian Roots, which hangs in York's student centre, shows a man holding rocks looking at a field and a bulldozer. On his back is a Palestinian flag and a map of Israel. Underneath are the words "justice" and "peace." Also Feb. 9, 100 Jewish and non-Jewish faculty members at York issued a statement in favour of free speech and against calling criticism of Israel anti-Semitic. "This tired alibi… is speech suppression and intolerance," they said.

Reject Israel swag, nominees urged

Boycott, divestments and sanctions founder and Palestinian activist Omar Barghouti wants stars like Matt Damon and Jennifer Lawrence to reject a $55,000 (US) 10-day trip to Israel that's part of the swag bags for some Oscar nominees. The bags, valued at $200,000, also include a lifetime supply of skin creams costing $31,200, laser skin care worth $5,530, and a 15-day tour of Japan valued at $45,000. Key nominees get the bags. "Israel is desperately trying to fight its increasing international isolation through bribes and intimidation rather than by ending its occupation and apartheid," Barghouti said Feb. 10. ■

Problem is in the classroom

The mural at York University is secondary to the real problem, which is what is being taught in the classrooms ("York U reviews policies in wake of painting controversy," Feb. 4).

My children attended York, and from discussions with them and students at other universities, it is clear that there is very little attempt to make the learning experience "inclusive," despite York's statement about the controversy.

One student told me that her Palestinian lecturer in a social science course told the class that she intended to teach them the Palestinian narrative. This happened in a course that had nothing to do with the Middle East. When asked about this, she replied that time did not permit the teaching of any alternative to her dogma.

Another lecturer during Israel Apartheid Week gave a reading list of only Palestinian sources. When questioned why there were no Israeli sources, she provided readings from anti-Zionist Israeli writers.

Students are not going to jeopardize their marks by accusing their teachers of bias. The twisting of minds by propaganda in the guise of academia is insidious and hard to deal with.

Social justice in Canada

The article "Rekindling the light of Jewish social justice," (Feb. 4) is a welcome call to action in our country's Jewish communal trajectory. I graduated from McMaster University in 2002 and moved immediately to New York City to participate in Avodah: The Jewish Service Corps. There was nothing like it at home in Canada. The year-long program retooled and invigorated my relationship to Judaism.

For the first time, I met policymakers and community leaders who spoke openly about how Jewish tradition guided their work in the modern secular world. For the first time, I met Jewish communal leaders whom I could relate to as a young adult, because we had explicitly shared values about social change. For the first time, I found friends from all Jewish backgrounds eager to engage deeply with our tradition in ways that spoke to our daily pursuits. The intellectual and spiritual stimulation from my year in Avodah shifted my relationship to Judaism. For the first time, Judaism became an inseparable part of my identity.

There are many reasons why Canadian Jews ought to think bigger about our communal role as agents of social change. It's our obligation, as our tradition teaches us. It's also a communal game-changer. This work draws in Jews who would otherwise be on the margins, and deepens the ties of those who are already engaged. This pursuit makes Judaism relevant, and in its relevance, it changes people, it changes the Jewish community and it changes the fabric of our country.

Promoting the prenup

It is incorrect that the halachic prenup for Canada I released last week ("Montreal rabbi promotes prenup to address agunot," Feb. 4) "bypasses" the beit din in Toronto or Montreal. It names the Beth Din of America to facilitate and direct the couple to their local beit din at the time of divorce. Couples in Montreal or Toronto should not have to travel to New York for their get.

The completely logical reasons why it is so worded are spelled out in the full explanation and instructions at www.adath.ca.

Rabbi Elisha Schochet disagrees with two of my halachic positions. Both of these opinions are the clearly articulated and published opinions of Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, widely acknowledged as the greatest halachic authority of our generation.

Rabbis and couples across Canada must know that by signing this agreement, they are acting in accordance with the highest and most respected halachic authorities in the world, and they are taking the most helpful step possible to eliminate the horror of agunah. How could anyone refuse to do that?

RABBI·2·RABBI

Stepping outside the shtetl bubble

How can rabbis stay engaged with the outside world and balance teaching passion for Judaism with an appreciation of other cultures?

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Cutler: On a recent flight to Israel, I sat in front of a Christian pilgrim from Calgary who had never before been on an airplane. On my return flight, I sat beside a young Eritrean man, also on his maiden flight, who was immigrating to Calgary after living for five years in Israel. As a frequent traveller to Israel, I was pleased to be among first-time flyers. And as a North American Jew, I was interested to hear the experiences of a religious Christian and an African migrant.

We congregational rabbis spend most of our professional and personal lives surrounded by people with a shared religion from a small geographical catchment. Except when we are engaged in inter-religious dialogue or mentoring someone toward conversion, many congregational rabbis have little substantive interaction with non-Jews. Yet, there is a much larger world beyond our own shtetls. That is the world in which most of our congregants live.

How do you stay engaged with the worldwide human community? What losses are there in living a more cloistered life than most?

Rabbi Scheier: I think many would object to describing a modern Canadian Jew's life as "cloistered." But, to an extent, everyone leads a slightly cloistered life. I once read a statistic that the average, city-dwelling person will meet three new people every day. Over the course of an average lifespan, this comes out to 80,000 acquaintances. While I would hardly call this a shtetl, compare it to the global population – or even the population of our cities – and we ultimately interact with a very small corner of the world.

I once saw a beautiful interpretation of the teaching in Pirkei Avot (4:12), which says in the name of Rabbi Meir, "engage in Torah study, be humble of spirit before every person." The commentator suggested this passage can be read as a warning to those who admirably immerse themselves in Torah study. Be mindful, the teaching exhorts, for even as we immerse ourselves in our own communities of like-minded friends, we are responsible to interact with respect with every person.

How do you think this objective is best accomplished? Beyond the occasional conversations with fellow travellers of different backgrounds, what responsibility do you see for engagement with a broader swath of humanity?

Rabbi Cutler: I often remind myself that God's covenant with Noah precedes God's covenant with Abraham. We are people before we are Jews.

As Jewish adults – all the more so as rabbis – I think we must connect with the greater world around us. We must read great literature and experience local culture. Not only does this link us to our congregants (who are also doing this), but it allows us to experience a part of God's creation. Such activities thicken the experience of being a person, which hopefully can only strengthen the experience of being a Jew.

What becomes tricky is the appropriate educational balance for children. To what extent should Jewish children be educated in the holidays, rituals and beliefs of others? How much time do we want to allocate for children to become knowledgeable world citizens versus committed to Jewish particularity? I believe the experience of being both human and Jewish requires us to engage deeply with Jewish wisdom and more general culture.

How do you balance the two?

Rabbi Scheier: When we speak about "connecting" with the greater world, I agree with you that this is a virtue that I endorse. As a former English literature major, I will often use aspects of literature to illuminate concepts or messages. (For example, as a source for my now-three-year-old daughter Allegra's name, I cited Longfellow's The Children's Hour, which mentioned the poet's daughter "laughing Allegra" – a blessing that has proved true in our home.)

However, I would differentiate between appreciation and passion. We must appreciate the beauty and depth that surrounds us, but at the same time, as rabbis, we teach passion for our own religion and its teachings. There is a delicate balancing act between teaching other faiths and doing so in a way that recognizes the uniqueness of our own tradition, without disparaging that of others.

If we can teach a passion for Judaism which is elevated and bolstered by an appreciation for local and foreign cultures, then we've embraced a strong Jewish identity for the 21st century. ■

Adoption doesn't have to be a last resort

But it can be difficult, costly, stressful, and lead to unique parenting challenges, especially for Jewish families

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Watching a loved one struggle with the physical, psychological and financial challenges associated with infertility treatment may elicit well-meaning outbursts like, "Well, why don't you just adopt?"

What many don't realize is that adoption can be just as difficult, stressful and costly as infertility – albeit in different ways – and may give way to parenting challenges that are unique to adoptive families in general, and Jewish families in particular.

First, it is important to note it's a misconception that Judaism doesn't welcome the concept of adoption.

According to the JCCA, formerly known as Jewish Child Care Association, a New York-based organization that offers a program called Ametz Adoption Program, caring for a needy child "supersedes the commandment to give birth to children. Traditional sources teach us that nurturing and raising a child are more important than giving birth... Adoption is not only acceptable, it is encouraged. Jewish law assumes that orphaned children will be cared for by others."

Despite this, the fact is that adoption is rarely a first option for families, and many couples must first come to terms with having "failed" to conceive a child naturally.

"It is in our genes that we want to replicate ourselves in terms of giving birth to children, and when that fails, we find people, if they can afford it... move to assisted reproduction," said University of Guelph professor emeritus Michael Grand, who co-directed the National Adoption Study of Canada in 1993 and wrote a book called The Adoption Constellation: New Ways of Thinking About and Practicing Adoption.

"They look to that route, and if that one fails, they look to adoption," he said.

Jan Silverman, an infertility counsellor who experienced infertility herself before adopting two children who were just days old when she brought them home, also talks about the concept of "failing" fertility before resorting to adoption.

"You go through the infertility crisis, and you fail at fertility, because you never do achieve that dream of having a child. Then you start on this adoption maze, when you start off with a home study. All of a sudden you're being evaluated... 'Why am I being scrutinized this way?'... 'What else do I have to do to prove myself worthy of having a child?'" said Silverman, who is an advocate for couples coping with infertility, as well as adoption.

Once a couple is legally verified as "adopt ready," which means they've completed a home study and adoption training, they have to be prepared for the financial cost of adopting. According to the Adoption Council of Canada, the costs can range from $3,000 to $30,000, depending on whether a couple chooses to adopt locally through foster care, through a licensed private agency or internationally.

For those to whom money is no object, often patience is a virtue. Wait times can take years, simply because there aren't as many children available today for adoption as there used to be, explained Noelle Burke, an adoption permanency worker with Jewish Family & Child in Toronto (JF&CS).

"The landscape of adoption in the province has changed drastically. To give you an example, at Jewish Family & Child, we might have done significantly more infant adoptions 30 years ago, whereas now we do probably about, on average, three per year," she said.

"If you look at the stats even for private adoptions... young parents are choosing not to place a baby for adoption. There are under 100 of those per year in the entire province," as a result of factors that include more access to birth control, abortion and the lack of stigma associated with single women raising children.

Grand added that the more specific the potential parents want to be in terms of the age of the child, the sex of the child, the cognitive capacity, and the emotional history, the more difficult it becomes.

"If you go in and say, 'I'll take any child who comes my way,' you have a far better chance of adopting a child than if you say I want a healthy, white infant," Grand said.

Yet, even in those cases, another roadblock for Jewish couples is the fact that a woman who decides to place her child for adoption can choose from a list of hopeful couples.

"It has been more and more the practice that the birth parents are part of the process of choosing who the adopted parents will be. If there is a bias against a child going into a Jewish home, that may make it more difficult," Grand said.

Burke suggested that couples advocate for themselves and give birth parents an opportunity to learn about what it would mean to be part of a Jewish family. "I strongly encourage them to advocate and say, 'Let me tell you more about what it is like in my family as a Jewish person and let me tell you about my traditions and why I'm a fantastic resource for a child,' and take the opportunity to break down some of the misinformation."

CJN Prize for Young Writers

At the inaugural awards ceremony for The CJN Prize for Young Writers, held Feb.10 on the campus of York University, some of our community's most gifted young writers displayed their talent to an enthusiastic crowd. It was an inspirational evening, for the winners and their proud families, for the enthusiastic crowd on-hand, and for the staff of The Canadian Jewish News.

Speaking to the crowd as the evening got underway, Barbara Kay, the National Post columnist and CJN contributor – and one of three judges for The CJN Prize along with CJN columnists Evelyn Tauben and Norman Ravvin – reflected on her own experiences nurturing young writers (this one included). Next, Carl Ehrlich and Sara Horowitz, representing the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York, meditated on the great history of Jewish writing and literature.

Then it was time to hand out some awards.

Jasen Sagman took home The CJN Prize, along with a cheque for $1,800 (a nice payday for any writer), for his essay, Who speaks out for Jewish refugees expelled from Arab lands? Ten runners-up prizes were also handed out to Michael Aarenau, Zack Babins, Mitchell Consky, Sarah Czosniak, Yardena Katz, Mira Katz-Blumenthal, Shoshana Mirlas, Jonah Simcha Chaim Muskat-Brown, Jessica Pollock and Roni Zveiris.

After everyone in attendance had collected their awards, four of the runners-up and Sagman took turns reading from their essays. If any of them were nervous, it didn't show.

Mira Katz-Blumenthal distilled the history of the Yiddish lullaby as "a primary vehicle through which Jewish mothers were able to articulate their dreams and aspirations for their children" during a reading of her piece, Loving Lullabies: Yiddish Cradle Songs as Vehicles of Maternal Expression. Mitchell Consky followed with an energetic recitation of Forty-Five Seconds of Free Fall Adrenaline, chronicling his maiden skydiving voyage, an experience he shared with his Israeli instructor.

Sarah Czosniak took the crowd on a trip through the Canadian prairies in her essay Finding Judaism in Rural Manitoba, including visits to the former Jewish farming colony in Bender Hamlet, Manitoba, and the ghost town of Hirsch, Sask., where she stumbled upon a Jewish cemetery. She then turned the stage over to Jessica Pollock, who considered the role of Jewish mothers as the pillars of Jewish communities in pre-Holocaust Eastern Europe in The Saga of the Eastern European Eshet Chayil.

Finally, Jasen Sagman read from his winning submission, a passionate defence of Jewish refugees displaced from Arab states after 1948 War of Independence. "This call to guarantee the rights and reparations for Jewish refugees from Arab states will not counter Palestinian rights and claims," he explained. "Rather, it will encourage all parties to recognize the fact that there were two groups of refugees, each of whom are entitled to redress and to an enduring peace and co-existence."

All told, the evening was a reminder of the reciprocal relationship between The CJN and the Canadian Jewish community – and, of course, an opportunity for Jewish mothers and fathers to shep naches from their talented children. As the ceremony drew to a close, there was little doubt that the future of Jewish writing in Canada looks bright. ■ — YONI

Shinshinim remain our friends long after they return to Israel

Michael Diamond

On Jan. 18, a diverse group of educators, rabbis, heads of schools, leaders from Hillel and several youth groups, along with lay leaders from Toronto's Jewish community met at Kibbutz Shefayim north of Tel Aviv to begin a six-day, whirlwind tour focused on the selection of a new cohort of shinshinim, for a program that brings young Israelis in their gap year before entering the Israel Defence Force (IDF) to Toronto for a year of service.

Toronto has the most extensive and intensive shinshinim program in the Diaspora. In 2016-17, Toronto will welcome 24 of the 115 shinshinim in the whole Diaspora. There will be 72 host families, and literally tens of thousands of children, adolescents, young adults, adults and seniors will experience these young people – sometimes intensely, sometimes less so – throughout the year.

The shinshinim are seen as rock stars in our day and supplementary schools, and they integrate into their host families in ways that ensure enduring positive change and relationships with Israel. You will see them at major milestone events like the Walk with Israel and Federation's campaign launch.

These are not just any young Israelis. These are the kids who come to live in our homes and invest in our children. They go to our camps, and spend their days in our schools and synagogues. They are incredible young people, who we learn to appreciate and respect and love during their time in Canada. And when they return home, we maintain, and even strengthen, our relationships. When they get married – and we had our first shinshin wedding only a few months back – we are invited. They return here to celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs, or just to visit. And through it all, as they wind their way through their Israeli lives, they remain our young friends.

The 48 candidates who applied to be shinshinim in Toronto. Twenty four were selected.

The Israel Engagement Team of UJA, along with its partner the Jewish Agency of Israel, take the selection process seriously. It's no accident that, to a person, the shinshinim are engaging, energetic, bright, knowledgeable, and highly capable of communicating their passion for Israel and Judaism.

During our time in Israel, we interviewed and we made choices. We met 48 young Israelis, each of whom was exceptional, every one selected from a deep pool of 2,000 candidates gathered by the Jewish Agency for Israel. The candidates told us why they wanted to take a year of their life to invest in Toronto with us. They shared their excitement about making a difference in our community. They told us why they insisted on making a difference.

It was not easy to choose. The candidates left after 36 hours together, went back to their homes, and awaited the calls that night which would let them know whether they were going to be spending a year in Toronto.

Later that week, we reunited with over 70 of our shinshinim alumni at a restaurant in Tel Aviv. Many of them traveled for hours from their homes and army bases to join us. And at the end of the week, we gathered with the 24 chosen young Israelis for a Shabbaton in Jerusalem to begin the next chapter in their lives. We got to know them better, we talked about life in Toronto and about making our community stronger by building closer connections with Israel, and becoming personally stronger and more Jewishly connected in the process.

And then, as the chosen ones led us in a Havdalah service to close Shabbat, their parents joined us and we interacted together as one big Jewish family – 60 older Canadians, 24 newly chosen shinshinim, their parents and many of their alumni predecessors all sharing in the excitement of the people-to-people connection between Toronto and Israel that can only come from a program like this.

We kvelled, we marveled, we strived, we interacted and created, we generated new ideas to strengthen Jewish life around Israel in Toronto. We reunited with former shinshinim and learned of their leadership work in Israel, heard of their experiences in the IDF and university, felt intense pride that we had a hand in helping these young Jews to become the best that they can be. And we returned with the knowledge that we would be introducing another 24 outstanding young Israelis into the Toronto community in 2016-17, our 10th year of this incredible program.

Is Canada considering restoring funding to UNRWA?

plungen@thecjn.ca

As the Trudeau government continues to reverse foreign policy decisions of the Harper administration, questions are being raised whether that will include the resumption of funding for UNRWA, the UN agency that provides services to Palestinian refugees.

In a Feb. 5 article, the Globe and Mail's Ottawa bureau chief Robert Fife reported that as part of a humanitarian package in the anti-ISIS mission, "the Liberals are expected to provide $15 million in annual funding to UNRWA... after the former Conservative government cut all $30 million in annual funding in 2009."

Contacted by The CJN last week, Fife said, "I expect the announcement in a month's time... The information came from a well-informed source."

Asked to comment on Fife's report, Global Affairs Canada stated: "The government of Canada provided $15 million in funding to UNRWA for humanitarian assistance in 2012. Canada has not yet made decisions on the allocation of new funding for humanitarian assistance stemming from the Feb. 8 announcement regarding Syria, Iraq, Jordan, and Lebanon. We are currently assessing the needs and programming options in the region. Canada remains concerned about the needs of vulnerable Palestinians and currently funds a substantial package of humanitarian assistance in the West Bank and Gaza."

For many observers of the Middle East, UNRWA remains a problematic organization. Its staff in Gaza have been linked to Hamas; unions representing UNRWA teaches and workers have been taken over by Hamas; the terror group's weapons were found in at least three UNRWA schools during Israel's war with Hamas in 2014; the agency's staff have ushered students to Hamas military training camps; and the curriculum at UNRWA schools has been called inflammatory and anti-Semitic.

Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said his organization "is opposed to funding UNRWA.

"This UN agency has been criticized for aiding and abetting Hamas... It has also been criticized for employing people sympathetic to Hamas' goal of destroying Israel, which would make it difficult to control the allocation of funds. I prefer that Canada set up its own agency on the ground with Canadian aid workers, not locals, to ensure the funds are used to assist the most vulnerable, especially children."

Meanwhile, UN Watch, a Geneva-based NGO, published reports in August and November that accused dozens of UNRWA staffers of "using the imprimatur of their official positions to incite Palestinian stabbing and shooting attacks against Israeli Jews, with one calling on Facebook to 'stab Zionist dogs.'

"UNRWA's strategy of impunity, denial and deflection only enables more incitement and violence. It's time to put an end to the pattern and practice of UNRWA school principals, teachers and staff members posting anti-Semitic and terror-inciting images, indicating a pathology of racism and violence within UNRWA," wrote UN Watch executive director Hillel Neuer.

Contacted in Geneva, Neuer told The CJN that "UN Watch is concerned about these reports [of restored UNRWA funding]. We think it comes at the worst possible time."

Neuer noted that at first, UNRWA denied UN Watch's reports of incitement – UNRWA spokesperson Chris Gunness urged the media not to report them – then confirmed them and suspended four staff members. They should have been fired, Neuer said.

"If someone urges to stab Jews because they're Jews and they're suspended and then returned to the classroom, it's absurd," he said.

Neuer said UNRWA is a politicized agency that fails to conform to the United Nations' stated goal of neutrality. It promotes a narrative of Palestinian return to Israel and its replacement. "It is subversive to peace, compromise and the two-state solution that Canada adheres to."

David Bedein has been tracking UNRWA for years. As director of the Israel Resource News Agency and of the Center for Near East Policy Research, Bedein has reported on Hamas taking over two important unions representing UNRWA staff and on those same school workers leading thousands of students from ages nine to 16 to attend three-week Hamas military training camps.

Bedein said the Center for Near East Policy Research, along with the Lawfare Project and the Legal Forum for Israel, retained two Arabic-speaking experts in Islamic studies to review more than 250 text books used in UNRWA schools. Among their findings were the "delegitimization of both Israel and of the Jews' very presence in the country, demonization of Israel and the Jews, non-advocacy of a peaceful solution to the conflict and, instead, emphasis on a violent struggle for the liberation of Palestine without limiting it to the areas of the West Bank and Gaza. Jihad, martyrdom and the so-called 'right of return' are part and parcel of that violent struggle."

Asked to comment, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs did not respond by The CJN's deadline. ■

Councillor seeks clarity on school nutrition funding

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

James Pasternak

According to the City of Toronto website, "Student nutrition programs are a cost-effective way to promote health and learning among students." The nutrients they provide "create healthier eating habits, help prevent obesity, support better scores in math, reading and science."

To advance those goals, the city subsidizes breakfast, snack and lunch programs in a number of Toronto schools

Unless of course you're a student in a private school. Then you're on your own.

On Jan. 26, at a meeting of the city budget committee, Coun. James Pasternak tried to get to the bottom of the policy that sees the allocation of municipal resources withheld from private schools. Pasternak, a member of the budget committee, told The CJN he was unaware of any formal policy that would restrict new health-related nutrition funding only to publicly funded schools (several Jewish schools have been grandfathered into the program.)

In fact, said Pasternak, council in 2009 indicated one of the principles in the delivery of programming is its universal applicability, and in July 2012, it adopted the nutrition program "for all Toronto schools. It does not say publicly funded schools."

Pasternak asked Dr. David McKeown, the city's medical officer of health, to explain the policy whereby private schools are ineligible for nutrition funding. McKeown told the budget committee that the city policy was meant to "come in line with provincial funding policy. There are really two reasons the city doesn't fund private schools. One is that the province doesn't fund them and the approach used in 'Nourishing Young Minds' is our approach, to ensure that our programs get funding from both levels of government to ensure they are fully viable.

"There are significant challenges in trying to assess need in the 300 private schools in the city," McKeown added.

Coun. Joe Mihevc also addressed the issue of nutrition funding for private schools. "That is going to create a problem," he told the budget committee. "We have 300 private schools in the City of Toronto. Staff have told me that to get a handle on it, it will be a heck of a lot of work, and we are still this year two years to go in the regular thing."

"The regular thing" Mihevc was referring to is the plan to bring 20 per cent of public schools under the nutrition program's umbrella by 2018. Currently, 14 per cent of public schools are funded, with the goal to increase that to 16 per cent in 2016, en route to 20 per cent in 2018.

Including private schools in the program is something that will have to wait, Mihevc told The CJN. "Not now, but at some point, if there are kids that need supports for student nutrition, they can get it."

"There may be some energy to look at the private schools," once the 20 per cent goal is reached, he said. At the moment, "we have to prioritize."

"I want to see every kid get a breakfast every morning who wants it or needs it. But right now, it's a question of phasing it in in a logical way," he said.

Pasternak, however, suggested McKeown was off base in saying the city was merely attempting to harmonize its funding with that of the province. "That's not appropriate, because this is a made-in-Toronto program," he said. "These are unelected bureaucrats who have taken it upon themselves to reject outright the applications from private schools."

He also suggested that it was a slap in the face to faith communities, both in being led to believe in rejection letters that there was still hope for funding in subsequent years and in being dismissed so readily.

"The City of Toronto relies heavily on faith communities for social capital, for running Out of the Cold, food banks, emergency shelters, community support services, spiritual guidance," Pasternak said. "The same people who praise the religious communities for all these great works and the social capital they invest in the programs, they say, 'Sorry, you're not eligible.' It's pulling out the rug from religious schools," he added.

Currently, 160,000 Toronto students participate in breakfast, snack and lunch programs every day. Pasternak said Toronto allocates $9.9 million to health programs. ■

My open letter to Trudeau: Jewish invisibility hurts

Gil Troy

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I get it. Of course you're annoyed. All you did was sign off on a perfectly reasonable statement marking International Holocaust Day by mourning the suffering of all who suffered.

What could be easier, nicer and less controversial? Yet, suddenly, the Jews erupt in fury, whining that this broad, sensitive embrace of all the victims didn't single them out. And even after you backpedal, many Jews still seethe.

Allow me to explain – and it has nothing to do with Harper-hankering. As a historian who knows that a political gaffe is a politician caught telling the truth, I believe you were being sincere. That's what scares me. I worry that if you can universalize the Holocaust, you will return to the bad old days of Jean Chrétien's "evenhandedness," which was a form of moral blindness. Doubting nationalism's virtues; minimizing the moral gap between democracies and dictatorships; and wanting to see the world, and especially much of the developing world, as much kinder, gentler and western than it is, this approach tended (and tends) to blame both sides of any conflict equally.

The key to understanding the Holocaust and to empathizing with those of us who felt excluded when you didn't single the Jews out for sympathy, is realizing that the Nazis singled us out for slaughter. Yes, they killed others, targeting dissidents, Communists and gays. But hating Jews, killing Jews, and what they in their ugly, techno-sterile language called "exterminating" Jews was central to their ideology, to their mission. It was "The war against the Jews," not just an unjust war. It wasn't any kind of evil. It was a specific evil, with a particular pathology and focus.

Let's face it – and I don't mean this condescendingly – you're too decent to absorb the extent of the Nazi evil. Unfortunately, we Jews are raised with the added burden of recognizing this obsession, because we have been targeted by it – and are still targeted by it. Your colleague, former Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, recalls the lesson his parents taught him following the Holocaust: that some events "in Jewish history, in world history, are too terrible to imagine, but not too terrible to have happened."

You don't invent Auschwitz, you don't kill three out of four European Jews, you don't murder six million people and you don't destroy a 1,200-year-old Euro-Jewish civilization without being supremely focused. The war against us was such a Nazi priority that even as Germany was losing the war, the Nazis stepped up the pace of the murder, diverting resources to killing our people, not protecting their own.

So, yes, we work hard to ensure that no one misses the point. And we are enraged because anti-Semitism has returned with a vengeance, masquerading as "just" "anti-Zionism."

This visibility-invisibility issue is playing out to our disadvantage again. Shortly after your statement, Israeli first responders killed three heavily armed Palestinian terrorists in mid-attack outside Jerusalem's Damascus Gate. The terrorists killed Hadar Cohen, a sweet 19-year-old who had just been drafted two months earlier to serve her country. Yet CBS News proclaimed (in a headline that was amended after complaints): "Three Palestinians killed as daily violence grinds on."

Forgive us our trauma. It's not "daily violence" that both sides provoke equally. It's not Palestinians being killed as part of some routine. It's Palestinian terrorists hunting Jews, being raised to hate Jews – and "succeeding." The next day, PA President Mahmoud Abbas hosted the parents of some of the murderers.

So, no, we won't be polite. We will be outraged. And we will pound away until you reassure us that you see how central anti-Semitism was then and is now in the current conflict. Please reassure freedom-lovers worldwide that while positioning Canada to be a constructive force for peace, you won't succumb to the moral laziness of a pox-on-both-your houses evenhandedness, failing to see who is guiltiest for perpetuating this conflict. ■

Recognizing pluralism at the Wall a good first step

Sara Horowitz

I have a confession to make about me and the Western Wall. We have, if you will forgive the pun, a rocky relationship.

In the late 1980s, around the time the Women of the Wall first organized to assert the right of women to pray as a group and read from the Torah at the Kotel, an Israeli colleague approached me and asked for my support. "The Kotel?" I remember saying to her. "Why would you want to pray at the Kotel?" I explained that I never felt spiritually inspired there. I found synagogue prayer much more uplifting. At the Wall, I always felt jostled and alone amid a cacophony of strangers. In a shul or chavurah, you could hear the words of Torah being chanted, and your voice intertwined with other voices in song. Intellectually, I understood the importance of the Wall to centuries of Jews. But emotionally and spiritually, I preferred to pray elsewhere.

"Well," my colleague responded, "isn't that precisely the point?"

She was right, of course. The type of praying permitted to women at the Wall has been radically different from that allowed men. A man can come alone or with other men. If he chooses, he can wrap himself up in solitude in a tallit and share his voice only with God. Or he may pray as part of group, sing, chant from the Torah, receive an aliyah. A women goes solo, wrapped in solitude, perhaps, but never in a tallit. Even on Rosh Chodesh, the new moon festival, designated since ancient times as a women's holiday, she prays only as an individual.

Some years ago, I accompanied a friend to the hospital for breast cancer treatment. I was planning to leave soon for Israel. When I drove her home, she asked me if I would put a note on her behalf into the Wall. Ask God, she said, to let her recover. Ask God to help her son grow up and marry a Jewish woman, no matter what happened to her.

Although I have lived in Jerusalem and travelled there for frequent and extended stays, until that time, I had never placed a note into the stones of the Kotel. I felt that inanimate objects, even the foundational stones of the Temple Mount, were simply inanimate objects. Notwithstanding the moving lyrics to a 1966 song that, echoing Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaKohen Kook, declares: "There are people with hearts of stone,/ There are stones with human hearts" – and with respect for those who place heartfelt and impassioned kvitelach into the cracks of the Kotel – I never felt comfortable doing it. To me, the practice feels idolatrous.

> The type of praying permitted to women at the Wall has been radically different from that allowed men.

But I could not refuse the request of a friend struggling with cancer. So I went to the Kotel, wrote a note on her behalf, and placed it in a fissure. And then I thought: what? I should put in a prayer on her behalf, and not one for myself? So I did. Contrary to my own ideas and feelings, I penned a kvitel and left it there.

If the Kotel has the power to move us spiritually, sometimes against expectations, it is because of its long history in the hearts and minds of Jewish people. To exclude anyone from praying meaningfully there is wrong. The recent designation of a portion of the area along the Wall for pluralistic practices is a step in the right direction. Some women are unhappy with that compromise. For one thing, it denies that the carefully delineated practices of Orthodox women in the group fit the framework of Jewish law, making haredi Judaism the final arbiter of Halachah. That, of course, is part of a larger issue of contention that spills into areas such as marriage, divorce and conversion. But designating a space that recognizes Jewish pluralism makes for a good first step. Take it as a metaphor. ■

Prime ministers, presidents and the Jews

Michael Taube

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and the Liberals were recently admonished for not mentioning the Jews (or anyone else, for that matter) in a Jan. 27 press release about International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Did the Liberals make this omission on purpose, or was it an oversight?

Opinion is mixed, to be sure. Trudeau has apologized for the incident. My sense is that the only error was in judgment. We'll see what happens with future press releases.

During this brouhaha, I started to think about my old friend and boss, former prime minister Stephen Harper. Would he have ever allowed this to happen? Would Jews, and other communities, have been mentioned in a Tory press release instead of "victims," the umbrella term the Liberals used?

Having held the pen for some of Harper's speeches, I can confidently say that it never would have happened. The Jewish community would have been mentioned.

It also got me thinking about American presidents and their (mostly) positive relations with Jews. Would they have handled this type of situation the same way as Harper or Trudeau?

Let's examine two presidents who stand out a bit more than the rest.

George Washington had a very good relationship with the Jewish community. As a strong believer in religious liberty and freedom, he felt all communities had an important role to play in building the country.

In particular, his 1790 letter to the Touro Synagogue in Newport, R.I., still stands out as one of the most pro-Semitic documents in early American history.

Washington wrote, "It is now no more that toleration is spoken of, as if it were by the indulgence of one class of people, that another enjoyed the exercise of their inherent natural rights. For, happily, the government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that they who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens, in giving it on all occasions their effectual support."

He also wrote this enlightening section, "May the children of the stock of Abraham who dwell in this land continue to merit and enjoy the goodwill of the other inhabitants; while every one shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree and there shall be none to make him afraid."

Abraham Lincoln, much like Washington before him, also had very good relations with American Jews. "I myself have a regard for the Jews," he once famously said.

Jonathan D. Sarna and Benjamin Shapell's book, Lincoln and the Jews: A History, shed new light on this rarely discussed subject. Lincoln's ancestors "were fascinated by Jews, and many in the town bore names," like he did, "from the Hebrew Bible." Early on, he was "deeply influenced" by schoolbooks that contained pro-Semitic passages, including Lindley Murray's The English Reader and William McGuffey's Eclectic Third Reader.

As well, Lincoln's parents "evinced no interest whatsoever in converting Jews to Christianity," so he was never taught to think differently of them.

"Lincoln knew Jews," Shapell noted. This future president "interacted with Jews, represented Jews, befriended Jews, admired Jews, commissioned Jews, trusted Jews, defended Jews, pardoned Jews, took advice from Jews, gave jobs to Jews, extended rights to Jews, revoked an expulsion of Jews, and even chose a Jew as his confidential agent."

As the authors note, "[h]is relationships with Jews were not exploitative but warm and genuine, and went further and deeper than those of any previous American president." Lincoln was "influenced by the Jews whom he befriended," and he "took account of Jewish sensitivities."

It's impossible to know how Washington and Lincoln would have handled the press release error. Times were different, and neither man witnessed the Holocaust. But based on their beliefs, support and appreciation of Jews, they would likely have favoured Harper's strong support over Trudeau's mea culpa. ■

The Three Menchketeers

Bernie Farber

It was 1979. Queen had a hit with Don't Stop Me Now, Anwar Sadat and Menachem Begin had just signed a historic peace accord, and the Iran hostage crisis began. It was also the year the three of us became life-long friends.

I was Jewish, Steve Kennedy was Protestant and Jack McCarthy was Irish Catholic. We came from different backgrounds, but shared much in common.

Our parents were our role models. They taught us about social justice and compassion for our neighbour, and instilled in us a sense of humour that has carried us a long way. We were all social workers. Steve very early on became a trusted friend and roommate after we were recruited as part of a team of youth workers to handle teens who were one step away from reformatory. Jack worked with the Ottawa-Carleton Children's' Aid Society, where I met him when I began working there as a protection worker that year.

We were baby boomers who had visions of changing the world. In our 20s, with frenetic energy to spare and in a more innocent time, we entered the field of social work with lofty goals.

We worked hard, we played hard and we were hit by various curveballs that showed us the world had many dark places. Poverty, alcohol and drug abuse, teenage depression and family violence became part of our work life and, in their own way, brought us closer together. When you work with such trauma, you need a shoulder, someone to listen. We became each other's shoulders and confidants.

Jack had already been married to Sharon for a couple of years when we all met. He was the one with the house, where many an evening was spent over good food, wine and beer, and where we learned so much about each other.

Steve, born in Barrie, Ont., moved to Trenton as a young boy. His dad was in the Canadian Armed Forces, and it was as a result that this Jewish kid, while visiting Trenton with Steve, learned to drink beer from quart bottles at the legion hall. Jack, like me, was born and bred in Ottawa, and despite the differences in our faiths, we both entered adulthood with similar values.

> We worked hard, we played hard... We became each other's shoulders and confidants.

I taught them Yiddishisms. We were the "Three Menchketeers," rebels in our own way. Our work, even with agencies that depended on municipal and provincial funding, was always community-oriented and child-focused. Jack worked to change the system to better reflect the needs of single parents (mostly mothers) who were trapped in poverty and living in assisted housing.

My attention was usually on the family and the-then provincial government's poor funding of agencies tasked with helping and protecting children in need. Steve worked with agencies that housed tough kids who could no longer live at home because they acted out so defiantly.

This was life-changing work for us, and despite its inherent sadness, it nevertheless made us understand that life requires hope.

I married Karyn in 1984 and moved to Toronto. It was a traditional Jewish wedding at Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas. My brother, Stan, was my best man; Steve and Jack, one Protestant the other Catholic, stood by me as my groomsmen under the chupah. We remained close. Steve got married to Karen in 1985, and to this day, the three couples get together whenever we can.

Alas, time, distance and work have affected our ability to see each other as we once did.

Nonetheless, late last month, after much planning, Jack, Steve and I met halfway between Ottawa and Toronto, at the Waring House Inn outside Picton, Ont. It was a weekend of food, wine and memories. How we laughed and how we told stories, and despite now being in our 60s, we came away feeling like were 25 again. For that very brief moment, we were once again the "Three Menchketeers." ■

From the perspective of the organized Jewish community, Max Blumenthal is beyond a polarizing figure.

As they see it, he's so far out on the fringe of the anti-Israel movement and his biases are so glaring that you've got to venture past people like Noam Chomsky and Norman Finkelstein before you start to get into Blumenthal territory. Then you've got to go a little farther – so far that the neo-Nazi Stormfronts and David Dukes of the world feel comfortable citing the U.S. writer as an authority when it comes to slamming Israel.

So why, ask the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, did PEN Canada invite the controversial author to discuss reporting from Gaza?

Blumenthal, author of The 51 Day War: Ruin and Resistance in Gaza and Goliath: Life and Loathing in Greater Israel will headline a Feb. 24 event at the Toronto Reference Library called "Embattled Truths: Reporting on Gaza." Olivia Ward, a foreign affairs reporter at the Toronto Star, is the co-panelist.

PEN, which promotes freedom of expression in Canada and abroad, is co-hosting the event in conjunction with Independent Jewish Voices and Another Story Bookshop as part of "Freedom to Read Week."

CIJA and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center are perplexed at PEN's choice of Blumenthal as their headline speaker.

"We thought this is an odd choice," said CIJA spokesperson Martin Sampson. "Why would they do that? Why would they put their reputation at risk by associating with Blumenthal?

"I think his extreme positions disqualify him for being a rational, reasonable contributor in the discourse about Israel," he added.

"Max Blumenthal represents the radical left's extremist belief that Israel is the embodiment of all evil and has no right to exist," said Avi Benlolo, CEO of the Wiesenthal Center. "His most recent book – (which has been) dubbed the 'I Hate Israel Handbook' – supports the mainstreaming of growing anti-Semitic attitudes by conflating Israel with Nazi Germany. While shunned by conventional media outlets, the book is popular on major anti-Semitic, neo-Nazi and conspiracy theory websites such as Stormfront and David Duke's Rense, where his work is used to promote anti-Jewish hate.

"I'm not sure what PEN is trying to achieve by giving Blumenthal a podium from which to spew his hatred, but if its goal is to contribute to increasing anti-Semitism in Canada, then I guess they will succeed," Benlolo said.

Max Blumenthal

Blumenthal is no stranger to controversy. His book Goliath, published by Nation Books, was eviscerated in a review by columnist Eric Alterman in The Nation magazine. Alterman called Blumenthal "a profoundly unreliable narrator," accused him of a lack of even-handedness, criticizes him for titling chapters that compare Israel to Nazi Germany and notes that after spending time with Blumenthal, left-wing Israeli author David Grossman asked the American author to tear up his phone number.

PEN spokesperson Brendan de Caires said the group's mandate is to "raise difficult subjects," without necessarily endorsing the views of those advancing them.

"We are a free speech organization. We embrace an open exchange of ideas," he said, adding that Blumenthal is a widely read author who has reported from Gaza and his experience fits the topic PEN was considering – reporting from a war zone.

"The whole premise of our discussion is that this is a hot topic," he said.

De Caires said PEN tackles difficult subjects regularly, such as the polarization of political reporting in Canada and free speech and digital warfare, the original topic for the event that was replaced by the panel on war zone reporting.

De Caires pointed to reaction on PEN's Facebook page, where the announcement of Blumenthal's upcoming address prompted "a huge amount of dialogue on this." Posts ranged from allegations the library would be "hosting raving anti-Semites" to the response, "if a Jewish person isn't in favour of apartheid they somehow hate all Jews?"

De Caires said in the past few years, PEN's Freedom to Read events attracted about 120 people. He said audience members can challenge Blumenthal's views during a question period. "We have no stake in the content of what Mr. Blumenthal says," de Caires said. "We support his right to say it."

Ana-Maria Critchley, manager of stakeholder relations for the Toronto Public Library, said she was aware Blumenthal's appearance has stirred controversy, but the event will be going ahead. "Blumenthal has been invited very clearly not because of his personal views, but to speak on his experience as a journalist," she said. ■

Faith groups key in refugee resettlement, event told

Faith communities in Canada tend to play a larger role in resettling refugees than they do in many other countries, Globe and Mail international affairs columnist Doug Saunders told a Feb. 5 event on the interfaith response to the Syrian refugee crisis.

In honour of United Nations World Interfaith Harmony Week, the Intercultural Dialogue Institute of the Greater Toronto Area in collaboration with Congregation Darchei Noam, Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue, presented a panel on efforts by Toronto's Jewish, Muslim and Catholic communities to sponsor and help refugees – particularly from Syria – integrate into Canadian society.

The event was held at Darchei Noam, and the audience of close to 250 people came from a cross-section of the three faith groups.

Saunders moderated a panel consisting of Naomi Alboim, professor and chair of the Policy Forum at the School of Policy Studies at Queen's University and a public policy consultant who in 1979 was the Ontario region's federal co-ordinator of the Indochinese Refugee movement; Habeeb Alli, member of the Canadian Council of Muslim Theologians and the Canadian Council of Imams, and a community development manager at International Development and Relief Foundation; and Martin Mark, director of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto's Office for Refugees.

Saunders emphasized the pivotal role Canadian faith groups have played in various international refugee crises since the 1950s and noted that in other countries, the government often plays a more direct role in settling refugees, with faith groups being more removed.

Regarding the current Syrian refugee crisis, Saunders said Canada is tending to accept what he called the "tougher cases," refugees who've been living in displacement camps in neighbouring countries rather than refugees of greater means who may have been able to pay their way to Europe. For that reason, in Canada it will "take the support of schools, communities and faith groups to make sure [the refugees] get the hand-holding they need," Saunders added.

The panelists took turns highlighting what their communities have been doing to help the Syrian newcomers.

Alboim, who's also a member of Darchei Noam's Syrian refugee sponsorship committee, said Lifeline Syria, a group she helped form last June that trains and assists groups sponsoring Syrian refugees, complements the work of mostly faith-based sponsorship agreement holders who "have been working in the trenches since the late 1970s to sponsor refugees from all over the world."

She noted that Canadian Jews were very active in sponsoring Vietnamese families in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

The Jewish community has stepped up in the current crisis, she explained, with 35 groups working under the umbrella of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) to form sponsorship groups, while others have formed independent sponsorship groups and some synagogues have joined mosques or churches to submit joint applications to sponsor Syrian families.

The current wave of anti-refugee and anti-Islam sentiment sweeping Europe "brings back painful memories" for us as Jews, she added, noting, "We're responding to this crisis as Jews, because it's the right, humanitarian thing to do, because it's an opportunity to put our values of welcoming the stranger and tikkun olam into practice, and as [many of us are] children of refugees, we're paying it forward."

Alli said Canadians must come to recognize that Islam is not a hindrance to Syrian refugees' integration into Canada.

"To those who call me and say, 'I want to sponsor a refugee but I'm wondering if they are Sunni or Shiite,' I say, 'Aren't they human beings?'" he said, adding that Canadians must trust the government, which is screening the refugees in collaboration with the UN Human Rights Council.

Mark noted that the Catholic response to the crisis has been significant, and Catholic charities have been working on the ground in countries such as Jordan and Turkey to help displaced Syrian refugees, believing that "settlement starts overseas."

Further, nearly one-third of the sponsorship agreement holder groups in Canada are Catholic agencies, he said.

Saunders said that while Canada gives refugees "a quick pathway to permanent residence and citizenship," education and employment are crucial. "Research shows that when people have the same level of education and employment and average income as people around them, the cultural stuff becomes a lot less difficult and tends to take care of itself," he said. ■

Labelling government anti-Israel is unhelpful: Housefather

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The Jewish community should stop fighting the battles of the last federal election and accept that a Liberal government is in power, Mount Royal Liberal MP Anthony Housefather advised a Montreal Jewish audience on Feb. 8.

He said the community should be respectful in its dealings with the government and avoid labelling it as anti-Israel or anti-Semitic, which is false and counter-productive.

"Impugning the government because of one word in a press release has to end, because it is not effective... Stopping the rhetoric is how we will achieve the most," Housefather said at a meeting organized by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, described by founder Frederick Krantz as an independent pro-Israel think-tank now in its 28th year.

Housefather said it would also be wise for Jews to show the government they care about other issues in addition to Israel, which they do.

He insisted the government has "enormous sensitivity" to Israel and Jewish concerns, noting that the Prime Minister's Office approved his attendance at a meeting of the International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians, held in Israel in December, the cost of which was paid for by that organization.

The experience showed Housefather that, besides the United States, Canada's current government is "more favourable to Israel" than any of the countries the other parliamentarians represented, and that includes in combating the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign.

Canadian Institute for Jewish Research chair Jacob Kincler, left, introduces MP Anthony Housefather.

He noted that Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has repeatedly denounced BDS, including labelling goods from the West Bank, because he believes it's "wrong to single out Israel when there are dozens of countries occupying disputed territories."

Housefather stressed that he wishes to be a forceful voice in his caucus for the concerns of the Jewish community. Although there are "at least" seven Jewish MPs – all Liberals – he, along with Michael Levitt of Toronto and Natural Resources Minister Jim Carr of Winnipeg, are probably the most "connected" to the community, he said.

In that regard, Housefather sees one of his most pressing tasks as speaking up about the danger Iran continues to pose to the world.

The normally unflappable Housefather was taken aback by the hostile reaction of a couple of audience members to his defence of Canada's lifting of certain economic sanctions against Iran and signalling that it wishes to resume ties with the country.

He called it "insulting" when one man shouted "bulls--t" as he spoke.

Housefather said he was "skeptical" about the nuclear deal, but that Canada must now "go with the world" and abide by the agreement.

He said he will raise awareness – "scream" – about Iran's funding of terrorism abroad, as well as its vow to destroy Israel, its Holocaust denial and its atrocious domestic human rights record.

"Iran is clearly an enemy of Israel and the Jewish People," he said.

But Housefather also said, "It is right for us to engage [with Iran]. We gain nothing by ignoring it... We would be penalizing Canadian companies. [The French company] Airbus can sell planes to Iran, but Bombardier can't. It doesn't make any sense."

In response to a question from audience member Nathan Elberg about the tone of Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion's pronouncements on Israel – which Elberg said couches support for the Jewish state in "demands" – Housefather said the Jewish community is "misinterpreting" what the minister said.

In his private discussions with Dion, Housefather said he has found no "equivocation" on Israel and that Dion had no intention of drawing a "moral equivalence" between Palestinian terrorism and Israeli government action.

Housefather said he has suggested that foreign affairs and others departments run communiqués by him first to avoid any wording that could be misunderstood by the Jewish community or that is insensitive.

Elberg also expressed concern about the appointment of new Toronto-area MP Omar Alghabra, whom the Conservatives have accused of having expressed anti-Israel sentiments in the past, as a parliamentary secretary to Dion.

Housefather answered that Alghabra is one of three such secretaries to Dion, and that his only responsibility is consular relations. "His influence [on policy] is limited. I looked into the allegations against him, and most are false... all were before 2004," Housefather said.

"CIJA [the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs] met him, and he affirmed his support for the government policy on Israel."

Audience member Machla Abramovitz raised concern about the effectiveness of the vetting of the 25,000 Syrian refugees Canada is committed to admitting.

Housefather explained why he is satisfied with the multi-step process and the conditions Canada has put in place, such as not accepting single men.

"We, as a people, know how necessary it is to bring in refugees... The last thing we want is another St. Louis," he said, referring to the ship transporting hundreds of Jewish refugees in the eve of World War II that was sent back to Europe. ■

McGill undergrads asked to consider BDS motion again

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

For the third time in less than 1-1/2 years a boycott, divestment and sanctions motion is expected to be considered by the McGill University undergraduates' association.

A new campus group called the McGill BDS Action Network has submitted a motion for consideration at the Students Society of McGill University (SSMU) winter general assembly to be held Feb. 22.

The motion calls on SSMU to support any BDS campaigns on campus and to pressure the McGill board of governors to divest from corporations "complicit in the occupation of the Palestinian territories."

Similar motions were brought before SSMU general assemblies in the fall of 2014 and March of last year.

In the first instance, the motion was shelved indefinitely, and students voted that the same motion could not be brought forward again.

At last year's winter general assembly, a reworded BDS motion was defeated 276-212 by secret ballot.

In both cases the motions were submitted by Solidary for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR). McGill BDS, which was officially launched on Feb. 4, claims to be a broader-based, "grassroots" campaign.

Among the campus groups it lists as endorsing the motion are the McGill Black Students' Network, McGill Students for Feminisms, the McGill Syrian Students' Association, the environmental activist group Divest McGill, and the Union for Gender Empowerment, as well as SPHR.

In contrast to last year, the response from pro-Israel students has been muted.

A spokesperson for Israel on Campus at McGill, which led the coalition of students opposed to the motion at that time, told The CJN Feb. 11 that the group won't be "leading this campaign's mobilization," but some of its members will be involved.

Zina Rakhamilova, a campus co-ordinator with StandWithUs Canada, said that the pro-Israel organization is involved in countering the motion and has "a professional campus person on the ground in Montreal mobilizing the students and planning a strategic campaign with our research staff and campus professionals."

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is working with Hillel, the main Jewish campus organization, in trying to encourage students to vote against the motion.

"CIJA Quebec and Hillel Montreal are currently supporting the students in their focused and well-reasoned response to the upcoming BDS anti-Israel motion anticipated on Feb. 22 at McGill University," Eta Yudin, CIJA's associate director of Quebec public affairs and Jewish community relations, said in a written statement.

"It is completely unfortunate that this type of motion continues to come up, almost wilfully in spite of the 'no' response... last year. It is as if the original movers of the motion are ignoring democracy. At this point, the feeling among the students is 'enough is enough.'"

Yudin said the BDS movement's "only real success is in getting headlines, but when it comes to their stated purpose, it is a failure. Canadian and Quebec universities are increasing their exchanges with Israeli counterparts and the number of joint projects or initiatives is at an all-time high."

Mount Royal Liberal MP Anthony Housefather said Feb. 8 he is encouraging Prime Minister Justin Trudeau to denounce the motion. Last year, as Liberal leader, Trudeau tweeted: "The BDS movement, like Israeli Apartheid Week, has no place on Canadian campuses. As a McGill alum, I'm disappointed."

As far as Housefather, a McGill law graduate, is concerned, there should be a moratorium on BDS motions for 20 years.

McGill BDS said that it has also submitted a report to the university board of governors' Committee to Advise on Matters of Social Responsibility on why McGill should relinquish its holdings in four specific corporations said to be profiting from the occupation or the expansion of the settlements.

They are G4S, a British security services company; L-3 Communications, an American surveillance and reconnaissance provider; the Israeli Mizrahi-Tefahot Bank; and the U.S.-based global real estate broker Re/Max.

McGill BDS scheduled several campus events before the Feb. 22 general assembly to raise awareness of its cause, including a talk by Chicago Rabbi Michael Davis of Jewish Voices for Peace. ■

- Develops and operationalizes acquisition strategies. Identifies and follows-up on prospective members and other opportunities to increase membership and converts prospects to members
- Works collaboratively with communication resources and drives frequent/regular community, web and social media communications and engagement
- Being the face of HBT to prospective members

2. Membership Engagement and Retention

Increases member connection and commitment to HBT programs and services and ensures the member experience is consistent, integrated and aligned to HBT goals for member experience and engagement. This includes:

- Develops and operationalizes retention strategies, including volunteer engagement.
- Gathering data and provide insight and analysis about member satisfaction, engagement, and retention and interests to ensure that they are connected to programs, services, and other members in ways that meet their needs.
- Collaborating regularly with HBT lay and professional leadership, to ensure that the member experience is consistent, integrated and aligned with member needs.
- Overseeing new member orientation and integration to ensure effective onboarding. Collaborating with clergy & program teams to ensure a seamless transition based on member-specific interests

3. HBT Community Development

Responsible for supporting and driving member engagement in communities and interests within HBT

- Individually and programmatically help members find groups that meet their interests.
- Create a web to connect congregants – creating community engagement through building existing and new groupings within the Temple community including chavurot.
- Professional leader for the volunteer teams
- Online community development (working closely with communications director)
- Outreach to other organizations in the Toronto Jewish "eco-system" to find partnership opportunities

Required Skills & Experience:

- BA/BS in Business, Marketing or related field or equivalent experience.
- Minimum of three or more years of Member Acquisition experience in a relationship-driven environment
- Ability to quickly build rapport and develop effective relationships with prospective members and congregants.
- Knowledge of community engagement and/or social media strategies to drive acquisition and retention
- Consistently self-driven and goal-oriented with the ability to set effective team and individual goals and take ownership for results
- Demonstrated ability to multi-task and adapt to changing contexts and priorities

Federation denies report Israeli singer supports BDS

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT, VANCOUVER

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver is preparing a warm welcome for Israeli pop star Achinoam Nini, who is set to perform in the city on Yom Ha'atzmaut, and is decrying what it says is an erroneous Jerusalem Post report suggesting Vancouver Jews are "outraged" about her appearance because she allegedly supports the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

"We take these concerns very seriously, and we have done our due diligence by looking closely into the facts. To the best of our knowledge, reports suggesting Ms. Nini promotes BDS are incorrect," the federation said in a statement, referring to a Feb. 9 Post story about the left-wing artist, known simply as Noa.

"We contacted Ms. Nini's manager directly to clarify her position. He provided the following statement: 'Noa is opposed to BDS. To say that she is a BDS supporter is an outright lie. She has never supported BDS – on the contrary – she has done all she can to bring many top artists to Israel and has done so with great success. Noa has a strong love for the State of Israel. She has served in the army, and her husband is an army officer,'" the federation statement read.

"Jewish Federation is unambiguous in our opposition to BDS, which is discriminatory and is antithetical to peace. We are deeply committed to continuing the fight against BDS at every opportunity," the statement added.

The group that denounced the federation for inviting Nini and claims she is associated with the BDS movement calls itself Vancouver United with Israel. Its only online presence is a Facebook page with 35 likes. The anonymous individual or individuals associated with the page did not respond to The CJN's requests for comment.

The group posted links on its page to statements by Nini expressing support for left-wing Israeli groups B'Tselem and Breaking the Silence.

In 2014, Nini and fellow Israeli singer Ariel Zilber were both selected to receive awards from ACUM, a non-profit group that seeks to ensure respect for copyright laws protecting artists' work. Zilber has expressed support for the political views of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, a far-right advocate of an exclusively Jewish Israel. Nini, by contrast, is a committed peace activist well known for her duet with Israeli Arab singer Mira Awad, with whom she represented Israel at the 2009 Eurovision Song Contest. Nini decided not to appear at the ACUM awards ceremony, citing "ideological reasons" and asked that "nobody accept the prize on my behalf."

Achinoam Nini

More recently, in January, she cancelled her membership in the Israeli Union of Performing Artists (EMI) after the organization decided to present Zilber with a lifetime achievement award.

In a Jan. 31 blog post published in the Times of Israel titled "Creative dissonance," Nini discussed Zilber's political views in detail, referencing his collaboration with Rabbi Yitzchak Ginsburgh, a radical right-wing rabbi in the West Bank. Rabbi Ginsburgh, she said, authored a booklet that exalts Baruch Goldstein, the 1994 murderer of 29 Arabs who were praying in a Hebron mosque.

"As if all this were not enough, Zilber has outwardly supported the murderer of [Israeli prime minister] Yitzhak Rabin, Yigal Amir, and supported his amnesty and release stating that he can 'understand him,' since he was simply acting ideologically to 'save the State of Israel,'" Nini wrote.

Of her decision to reject the ACUM award in 2014, she said she wanted neither the glory nor the money. "I simply wanted to stay away from what I considered to be a real betrayal of the message artists should be sending out to society. It was unconceivable to me that an artist who had put his art in the service of such radical racism and hatred of the other, who had expressed time and time again, in words, music, public activity and political activism, all the values that a society must shun and condemn, and on top of it all, had supported the killer of a prime minster, be elevated to the status of cultural icon and role model." ■

Aboriginal trip to focus on Israeli innovation

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Chief Ron Evans, the leader of the Norway House Cree Nation in Northern Manitoba, believes Israeli entrepreneurship can motivate his community's youth to achieve more.

For the third time in five years, Evans is leading a group of younger community members on a tour of Israel.

There will be 25 Norway House band members going on the 2016 Youth Leadership Development Mission to Israel, Feb. 22 to March 2, Evans said.

Norway House is a community of about 6,000 some 450 kilometres north of Winnipeg on the northern shore of Lake Winnipeg. Evans, who served two terms as grand chief of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs, said the Israeli experience naturally resonates with Canada's First Nations.

"Our aim is to develop the next generation of First Nations leaders by looking through the lens of Israel's inspiring story," he said. "Israel is first and foremost the land of the heritage of the Jewish People, who have achieved self-determination in a modern democracy and diverse state. Those of us from First Nations communities can appreciate the fascinating balance between modern and ancient that we see in Israel, and especially the sense of connection to the land of one's ancestors."

There is also a spiritual connection between his people with their Christian faith, and the land of Jesus as well as of the Jews, he said. "We learn the stories of the Bible. Therefore, a visit to Israel will resonate more with my people than a trip to a theme park such as Disneyland."

This year's mission – the previous trips were in 2012 and 2013 – will be focus especially on Israel as the "start-up nation." "We want to see what we can learn from Israeli innovation," Evans said. "Perhaps we will be able to forge some links that will benefit our community economically."

So, while there will be visits to Christian religious sites – the area around the Sea of Galilee, Bethlehem and a reputed baptism site on the lower Jordan River – and some of the regular tourist destinations including Yad Vashem and Jerusalem, Independence Hall and Jaffa, Caesarea, Masada and the Dead Sea, and a visit to a Bedouin village – the Norway House group will learn about Israeli technology and economic development.

Chief Ron Evans

On their second day in Israel, for example, they will receive a briefing on Israel's high-tech sector. They will later be introduced to new developments in medicinal agriculture, including a tour of projects in the Upper Galilee, and water technology. They will also visit the Ahava factory, a hospitality staff training centre in Herzliya, a 3D printing operation and Kol HaOt, an international Jewish educational art program.

Evans said it was difficult to attract participants the first year. "There was a lot of fearmongering about war and violence. But that first trip was so successful that we didn't have any trouble getting together the second group. We had a full slate for this year, including Norway House author Brenda Fontaine, and other aboriginal community leaders are asking us how we organized the trip.

"We hope to make this mission to Israel an annual event."

Shelley Faintuch, community relations director for Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and associate director of local partner services of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, who organized the mission's itinerary, noted that the Norway House Cree Nation successfully raised all of the funds for the trip through various initiatives, including a golf tournament, silent auctions, raffle tickets and pancake breakfasts.

"I am very excited to do the mission with Norway House Cree Nation this year. Learning about small entrepreneurship in Israel, seeing Israel through the eyes of first-time visitors and sharing the adventure. There could be nothing better." ■

Adoption 'was something I felt I had to do,' mom says

Montreal-based mother Tanya Margolese said adopting a child was a "lifelong dream" of hers.

"Whether or not I'd have my own children, it was something I felt I had to do, to take a child who is in the world and doesn't have what it needs, and to be able to give and provide for it," said Margolese. She and her husband have four children – one biological, two stepchildren and one adopted.

She recalled the challenges associated with the two-vear process and the search for "the youngest, healthiest child that we could get."

Having chosen to pursue an international adoption in Ukraine, Margolese, her husband and youngest daughter, spent 2-1/2 "difficult" months in Ukraine to go along with the protocol outlined by the State Department of Adoption in Kiev.

"We went through what they called a blind adoption, basically. You go there not knowing who you are getting."

She said families are granted appointments with the Ukrainian adoption department to choose a child out of a catalogue full of hundreds of photos.

"If you haven't chosen a child by the third appointment, there is no fourth appointment, which is scary and it puts on a lot of pressure."

Margolese and her husband connected with a young girl, who was seven at the time, and brought her home in 2012.

"She sat with us, but spoke no English, so we couldn't really communicate verbally… but when she walked into the room, she took my breath away. It was a very touching moment."

She said there were a few challenges in terms of helping their daughter adjust to a new life with an observant Jewish family.

"Her interpersonal interactions weren't as strong as they should have been. I think her level of maturity was lower than it should have been. She had never really grown up in a family, so she didn't know the various roles of the people in the family, and it took her a while to establish herself within our family in terms of her role as a daughter. They said she was a leader, and she came thinking she was a leader in our home, too," she said with a laugh.

"Even today, I have to remind her who the mommy is."

Elissa Gamus, a Toronto-based family lawyer, said she adopted her son following struggles with infertility, but said adopting a child wasn't a last resort because she couldn't get pregnant.

"I got married later, and we experienced infertility issues, but I [intended to] have a child through fertility and a child through adoption," she said.

Gamus and her husband enlisted Michael Blugerman, one of Ontario's most experienced adoption counsellors and facilitators, to help them through a private adoption.

But Gamus said she was "very, very lucky" to successfully adopt her son, Joseph, from birth.

"A girlfriend of mine is a midwife, and she had a patient who was looking to place her son for adoption and she mentioned it to me. We were seeing Michael at the time for other opportunities, and he said, 'It's not going to happen. Joseph is black and in the black community, the families keep their children, even if it means that the grandparents will raise him, so forget about it,'" Gamus recalled.

But they went ahead through the legal process and red tape and were able to finalize the adoption without a hitch.

"One of the things that was addressed to us was that adopting a child out of your race, and who is not visibly of your race, [would present challenges,]" she said.

"Joseph is visibly black, and his personality, like the way he walks, his interest in certain things, he connects both with the Jewish community and with the black community."

Gamus said Blugerman explained to them that adopting a black child into a Jewish family is much less common than adopting Asian or Russian children, and warned her to "be aware that you are going to have some challenges."

Beyond the social challenges, Silverman said there are differences between raising a biological child and an adopted child.

"When you adopt, there are differences. You can talk about it being exactly the same, but it's just not… My daughter didn't finish high school. I have two friends in the Jewish community whose kids didn't finish high school, but other than that, they all went to university. The commonality in that is that they are also adopted," she said.

Silverman said it's natural to point the finger at the parents, but that is usually not the issue.

"I'm a really good mom. There were other issues that were involved… I have two successful adoptions. I have two really good kids. But there is a recognition of difference [between having biological children and having adopted children]… The fact that my daughter's birth mother only went to Grade 8… we know that there is a higher incidence of learning disability in the adoption community. It's true. It's not that biological kids don't have learning disabilities, but the percentage is higher," Silverman said.

"We want to deny the heredity and think that it is all about environment, nurture over nature, but it's not. A line I learned at an adoption conference once, which I love, is that we are nurturing nature. And I think that is brilliant and that says it all." ■

Situation not ripe for two-state solution: Netanyahu

ADIV STERMAN AND MARISSA NEWMAN
JERUSALEM

Israel has no choice in the current political reality but to continue its control of the West Bank, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week, asserting that the Palestinians have yet to meet the basic requirements outlined by the government for a final peace agreement between the two nations.

Netanyahu told a special Knesset debate on the two-state solution Feb. 10 that he was in favour of the idea, but in practice did not see it being possible unless the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state and agree to a demilitarized state.

He also rejected the claim that Israel's policies in the West Bank were driving the current round of violence, as asserted by some officials in the international community.

Netanyahu has held fast to both demands of recognition and demilitarization since accepting the idea of a two-state solution in 2009, but they have never been formally accepted by the Palestinian Authority.

"It's only natural that they give us what they are asking for themselves," the prime minister said of his requirement for Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state.

He added that experience has taught Israel that only the IDF can guarantee a full disarmament of the West Bank, not the UN or any other international force.

"There is no security separation. None. It doesn't exist," Netanyahu said. "Israel must be responsible for its security," he continued, adding that without mutual recognition and disarmament, the Jewish state could not afford to sign a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

The prime minister also appeared to mock Opposition leader Isaac Herzog over his recent acknowledgment that a negotiated two-state solution was not currently possible and his call for Israel to take unilateral action.

"Good morning, Bougie," he called out, using Herzog's nickname. "It seems you are the last to realize the reality."

Netanyahu said that in light of the string of protests which flared across the Arab world in 2011, he began doubting the feasibility of achieving a two-state solution. He characterized the Arab Spring uprisings as "anti-West, anti-liberal, anti-Israel," and said he faced "serious criticism" for his assessment.

"My responsibility as prime minister is not to dig my head in the sand," he said. "We are fighting the enemy inside our borders and outside them." The prime minister referred to the upgraded security fence at the border with Egypt, without which he claimed Israel would have been "overrun" with migrants and subject to infiltration by jihadist terrorists.

"In the face of the incredible changes around us... in the current circumstances, we can't implement two states for two nations," he said.

Netanyahu said that while he had no desire of creating a binational state, if the West Bank were to be evacuated by Israel the region would be overrun by Islamist extremists who strive to destroy Israel.

Netanyahu rejected statements that Palestinian terrorism stems from "desperation."

"Terror is not a result of occupation," he said, in an apparent reference to comments along these lines by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon. "The terror stems from a culture of death. Its goal is not to free a state, it is to destroy a state.

"Terror is the result of a totalitarian ideology" and a desire to kill Jews, the prime minister said.

Herzog said Netanyahu's words were "hollow," adding that he believed it was possible to achieve security for Israeli citizens by ensuring a separation between the Jewish state and the Palestinians, but that the prime minister was uninterested in such a solution.

"You do not really intend to separate from the Palestinians, we may surround the state with fences, but the Palestinians will remain among us," the Zionist Union leader said. Herzog warned that "without separating from the Palestinians, Israel will turn into an Israel-Arab state," and Jerusalem will have "an Arab mayor."

"You have even failed at guaranteeing 'life itself'," Herzog said, referring to a 2015 tweet by Netanyahu regarding the Iranian nuclear threat in which the prime minister stated that "when we talk about the price of housing, about the cost of living, I don't forget life itself for a single moment."

Earlier in the week, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said the actions of Israeli extremists were driving a nearly five-month-long wave of attacks.

UN chief Ban and others have blamed the violence on Palestinian desperation over the lack of a political horizon after years of stalled peace efforts.

The last round of U.S.-brokered Israeli-Palestinian talks fell apart in 2014 amid mutual recriminations. ■

PM plans fence around Israel

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced his intention to "surround the entire State of Israel with a fence," including sealing off openings in the West Bank security barrier.

Speaking during a tour of the Jordan border area in the south on Feb. 9, Netanyahu said the extensive project would also address the potential threat of cross-border tunnels into Israeli territory.

"If you're thinking of erecting a fence there you have to take into account that they could tunnel underneath it," Netanyahu said. "The people who said that there is no significance to [retaining] territory in the modern age should go to Gaza."

In its 2014 conflict with Israel, the Gaza-based terrorist group Hamas, as well as firing thousands of rockets and mortar shells into Israel, used a network of subterranean passages to infiltrate Israeli territory, launch attacks and in one case, during fighting inside Gaza, kidnap the body of an Israeli soldier.

"In our neighbourhood, we need to protect ourselves from the predatory animals," Netanyahu said in an apparent reference to extremist Islamist movements.

Unlike the borders with Egypt and Jordan, where both sides of the fence are in relatively open areas, Netanyahu hinted at potential problems implementing a reinforced barrier in West Bank "where you have built up areas, buildings along the separation line."

But, the prime minister added, Israel is "formulating a plan to seal off the openings in the security fence in the West Bank.

"At the end of the day, in the State of Israel as I see it, there will be a fence like this one [the border fence with Jordan currently under construction] surrounding its entirety," he said. "We will surround the entire State of Israel with a fence, a barrier."

The project, which is also set to include a new fence along the border with the Gaza Strip, will cost "many billions," he said.

Last month, construction began on a security fence along the Jordanian border.

In accordance with a 2015 government decision, approximately 30 kilometres of fence is initially being built, from Eilat to beyond a new international airport currently under construction in the Timna Valley. This portion of the project is expected to be completed by the end of the year, and will cost approximately NIS 300 million ($110 million), which will be drawn from the Defence Ministry budget.

In 2013, Israel completed a five-metre-high barbed wire fence along its border with Sinai, seeking to prevent terror groups, drug smugglers and African migrants from infiltrating Israeli territory from the Egyptian peninsula. ■

Why Sanders is no big deal – to Judaism or America

DANIEL TREIMAN
JTA, NEW YORK

Bernie Sanders is having a month of historic firsts.

In New Hampshire on Feb. 9, he handily won the Democratic Party contest, becoming the first Jew to win a presidential primary. In Iowa, he became the first Jewish presidential candidate – the first non-Christian, even – to win delegates in a major party's caucus or primary.

But that's trivia.

What's more significant is that he's the first Jew to mount a credible campaign for the White House.

It's not that credible Jewish politicians haven't run for president before. There was Republican Sen. Arlen Specter in 1996 and Democratic Sen. Joseph Lieberman in 2004. But they were out of step with their parties and their candidacies went nowhere. (Both later quit their parties.)

And if the prospect of Republicans nominating a pro-choice Jew in the 1990s or Democrats tapping a Jewish hawk in the Iraq War's aftermath seemed far-fetched, the notion of a Jewish socialist with a thick Brooklyn accent giving Hillary Clinton a run for her money is really incredible.

Yet one aspect of Sanders' improbable candidacy is, remarkably, treated as mostly unremarkable: his Jewishness.

Sanders doesn't go out of this way to highlight his Jewish background, nor have his supporters or opponents made it an issue. The Jewish community has not rallied around him, nor has there been, until now, any Jewish groundswell of public pride or anxiety over his campaign. We have not heard calls for Jews to support their fellow Jew.

Contrast this with the prominence of gender in discussions of Clinton's candidacy.

Former secretary of state Madeleine Albright and feminist icon Gloria Steinem caused a stir recently when they seemed to rebuke younger women who back Sanders over Clinton.

"There's a special place in hell for women who don't help each other!" Albright said.

Meanwhile, American Jews are united in comparative nonchalance about Sanders' Jewishness. Partly that's because few expected he would do so well. But it's also because Lieberman already broke the Jewish glass ceiling. His 2000 vice-presidential run proved Americans were prepared to put a Jewish candidate a heartbeat away from the presidency.

Of course, Lieberman wasn't just a Jewish candidate. He was a very Jewish candidate. He wore his identity on his sleeve: an Orthodox Jew outspoken in his support for Israel and other Jewish causes.

Sanders is different. He describes himself as "not particularly religious." He is married to a non-Jewish woman. He is aloof from Jewish communal life. A Sanders campaign ad described the candidate simply as "the son of a Polish immigrant."

Tellingly, last Rosh Hashanah, Sanders wasn't in synagogue. He was in church – well, not church per se, but he was at Liberty University, the conservative Christian educational citadel founded by the late Jerry Falwell. Sanders was there preaching his secular brand of social justice gospel. Democratic socialism, not Judaism, is his real religion.

But Sanders is also, in his own way, a very Jewish candidate.

Sanders cleverly acknowledged as much during his Feb. 6 Saturday Night Live appearance alongside his comic doppelganger, Larry David. Playing a rabble-rousing socialist immigrant aboard an ocean liner bound for America, Sanders introduces himself as "Bernie Sanderswitzky, but we're going to change it when we get to America so it doesn't sound quite so Jewish." To which David deadpans: "Yeah, that'll trick 'em."

It's not just Sanders' Brooklynite bearing that marks him as inescapably Jewish. Nor is it the fact that he volunteered in Israel on a kibbutz. (After all, former Republican presidential hopeful Michele Bachmann also worked on a kibbutz, and her 2012 presidential campaign's Judaic highlight was her mangling of the word "chutzpah.")

Rather, Sanders' personal and political story is emblematic of a whole generation of Jewish idealists.

Sanders was far from the only young Jew in the early 1960s to fervently embrace socialism, following in the footsteps of Jewish radicals from earlier eras. Like many Jews, Sanders was deeply invested in the black struggle for civil rights; he was active with the Congress of Racial Equality and attended Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream" speech. After college, Sanders was in the vanguard of the mini-migration to Vermont of socially conscious Jewish urbanites going "back to the land."

Today, Sanders invokes his Jewish roots to explain his passion for combating bigotry.

In one of his campaign's most memorable moments, a young hijab-wearing woman at a Sanders rally told the candidate she was worried about anti-Muslim rhetoric in American politics. Sanders beckoned her over for a hug.

"I'm Jewish," he said. "My father's family died in concentration camps. I will do everything that I can to rid this country of the ugly stain of racism."

Sanders' disconnect with organized Jewry, his attenuated religiosity and his marriage to a non-Jew are not atypical for American Jews, plenty of whom are unaffiliated, secular and intermarried. Sanders fits comfortably into the growing category that Jewish demographers dub "Just Jewish."

At the same time, Sanders' staunchly left-wing stances occasionally have taken him outside even the liberal mainstream of American Jewish politics. For instance, Sanders backed the Rev. Jesse Jackson's historic presidential bids in 1984 and 1988, notwithstanding the black leader's then-acrimonious relationship with the Jewish community.

On Israel, too, Sanders expresses positions that would put him at odds with Jewish communal leaders. He has strongly criticized Israel's treatment of the Palestinians and suggested that as president he would "maintain an evenhanded approach to the area." Yet he has come under fire from anti-Israel activists, as when he was heckled at a 2014 Vermont town hall meeting for expressing sympathy with the Jewish state over the threat it faces from Hamas rocket attacks even as he condemned Israel's conduct in Gaza.

Iowa and New Hampshire can't tell us much about how Sanders will perform with Jewish voters, and Clinton has plenty of Jewish devotees. But these early contests do indicate that Sanders' Jewishness isn't hurting him with Democrats. If anything, Sanders' fans find his disheveled-old-Jewish-socialist-from-Brooklyn image to be a charming badge of authenticity.

Still, there are those who think being Jewish can be a political liability. New York City's former mayor, Michael Bloomberg, who is toying with the idea of jumping into the presidential race, once expressed doubt that America would elect a "short, Jewish, divorced billionaire." Bloomberg may be correct that being a billionaire or short could be a liability, but is he right about Jewishness?

Polling suggests that Jews may be America's most popular religious group. Jews are warmly regarded by Democrats and Republicans, evangelicals and atheists. A recent poll by the Pew Research Center found that only 10 per cent of Americans are less likely to vote for a Jew for president, compared to 20 per cent who said they were less likely to vote for an evangelical Christian.

Perhaps it's because everyone can seem to find something to like about Jews: to conservative evangelicals, Jews are the Bible's "chosen people;" to secular and liberal Americans, Jews are liberal, secular types.

Sanders' identity as a socialist may be much more problematic: 50 per cent of Americans say they wouldn't vote for a socialist. And the fact that he's not particularly religious could be a liability: 51 per cent of Pew respondents said they were less likely to vote for an atheist for president.

If Sanders' Jewishness is not an issue, perhaps it's because Jews are so well-integrated into contemporary American life. Indeed, Sanders is not the only presidential hopeful with intimate Jewish ties. His rival for the Democratic nomination has a Jewish son-in-law who donned a yarmulke and tallit at his wedding to Chelsea Clinton. The winner of New Hampshire's Republican primary, Donald Trump, has a daughter who converted to Judaism and goes to an Orthodox synagogue.

What's remarkable is how unremarkable this is. ■

OPINION

The end of Israel's religious establishment?

Gerald Steinberg

If you read the standard media reports on Israel, particularly on core identity issues such as religion and politics, it's easy to conclude that the religious establishment, including the Chief Rabbinate, is getting stronger, and efforts to build alternatives are all failing. But this would be a false impression, reflecting too much emphasis (including from media reports) on formal structures, while missing informal – but far more important – social and cultural flows.

In Israel, the Jewish religious establishment, in different forms, is closely integrated into the political structure and represented by political parties that, while small, are often the linchpins in governing coalitions. As a result, they're able to exert power far in excess of their actual support among the population, which gives institutions such as the Chief Rabbinate disproportionate impact. And like other political actors around the world, these groups cling tenaciously to power, which in this case means attempting to block all efforts at significant reform and liberalization.

In the current situation, with a very narrow government majority (61 to 59 in the Knesset), survival rests on co-operation with the small religious parties that represent these entrenched interests. As a result, the Knesset has walked back some of the earlier agreements to liberalize positions on personal religious status, particularly on such issues as conversion, marriage and divorce. Thus, in formal terms, it appears that nothing is changing.

However, informally and unofficially, the process is very different, although less visible and below the radar of most journalists. A large and increasing number of young Israeli Jews are experimenting with new and interesting forms of Jewish life. In Jerusalem and other cities, there are dozens of new and unaffiliated minyanim (prayer groups and congregations), reflecting the full range of options and far removed from the official rabbinate, which is rapidly moving itself into irrelevance. Many young couples choose to ignore the state religious structures when they get married and are developing new twists on ancient Jewish rituals to make the occasions meaningful to them.

None of this is easy, the power of the rabbinate and its accompanying institutions is deeply rooted in 2,000 years of Jewish history in the Diaspora, and working out how to adapt to the return to our homeland and national sovereignty is one of the major challenges of modern Israel. Although democracy is not entirely foreign to Judaism, there is also a long tradition of fealty to rabbinical authority.

In addition, during this long history, women were largely excluded from power-sharing, but in 21st-century Israel, this is changing, although not smoothly in the formal religious institutions. Instead, many women are active in the alternative and unofficial structures – particularly in the advanced educational frameworks focusing on evolving Jewish law and traditions, as well as in kosher certifications (a major source of political and economic power).

Much of the media attention has been focused on the Western Wall in Jerusalem, where the conflicts over symbolism are played out in public view. Recently, the government voted for the first time to remove part of this area from official rabbinical control, allowing pluralist groups, including women, to gather and pray without the previous restrictions. This move, which was taken against the strenuous objections of the religious establishment, is primarily designed to appeal to Diaspora groups, particularly in the Reform and Conservative movements, where mixed prayers (men and women) is the norm.

None of this means that the conflict has been resolved – nothing in Israel, and particularly Israeli politics, is that easy and straightforward. But Judaism as a religion, tradition and culture has always evolved through the actions of the kehillah – the congregation. Rabbis can persuade, educate and cajole, but they cannot impose their views on the wider public. And in Israel, as Jewish society changes, so will the rabbinate. ■

The Agenda marks its 10th anniversary

Steve Paikin and the new studio of The Agenda.

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Click on Steve Paikin's blog and you can see the anchor of TVOntario's flagship current affairs show giving a tour of its brand new studio. The Agenda with Steve Paikin now has a bright backdrop, multiple sets, and a massive audio-visual screen, all of which was made possible by a personal bequest.

"Donald Pounder loved the show and remembered us in his will. The new sets are fantastic. They give us flexibility and utility," Paikin said in a recent telephone interview.

The new look of The Agenda – it airs on TVO week nights at 8 and 11 p.m. – is one of several changes that have been made as the show marks its 10th anniversary.

Paikin, 55, said there's also a new format. Instead of devoting one hour to a single subject, The Agenda will now air smaller segments on multiple subjects. "The original format was a one-on-one interview and a 40-minute debate. It was good for 9-1/2 years.

"You have to change before people tell you you're stale. Not everyone wants to watch a 50- or 60-minute interview. Sometimes they want something bite size."

But he stressed that this change does affect the quality of the content. "I don't want to give the impression that we're not having in-depth discussions and interviews. We still do the longest interviews on television."

Paikin acknowledged that the format changes were made to appeal to a younger audience. "We keep tweaking the show to attract younger viewers," he said. "We're always trying to find new voices to reflect the province."

He said the new format is better suited to digital platforms. "I don't care if people watch us on TV, smartphone or computer. We're platform agnostic.

"Unlike other shows, we don't lose money if you watch us online."

The Agenda does not depend on advertising dollars, as TVO is a public broadcaster. "It's nice not to have to look at the ratings."

The Agenda is actually the fifth current affairs show Paikin has hosted at TVO.

Back in 1992 he was a news anchor on CBLT and a rising young star at CBC, when Howard Bernstein, his executive producer at CBC, introduced him to Peter Herrndorf, then chair and CEO of TVO. They thought Paikin would be the right person to host a new current affairs show being developed at TVO.

"I had been at CBC for seven years and worked my way up to anchor," Paikin said. "I thought it was what I wanted, but it turned out it wasn't what I thought it would be. I was reading scripts that other people wrote. It was more performance than journalism."

> Unlike other shows, we don't lose money if you watch us online.

Paikin jumped the ship for TVO in 1992.

"Peter (Herrndorf) told me it would take awhile to get adjusted and that I would always miss working at the CBC, but I would not regret leaving.

"He was absolutely wrong. After four days, I felt at home and I did not miss the work at the CBC. Working in depth was so interesting... It's all about good story telling and analysis. I devoured that mission from the moment I got here."

He hosted Between the Lines until the 1994 debut of Studio 2, a magazine-style, current affairs program, he co-hosted for 12 years. He also co-created and hosted the Queen's Park magazine, Fourth Reading, as well as Diplomatic Immunity, a weekly foreign affairs commentary show.

Paikin said his work at TVO has been a foundation to do many other "fascinating projects." He's moderated six political leadership debates (three federal and three provincial), he's produced six feature-length documentary films, and he's now writing his seventh book.

He's also a visiting professor at Ryerson University and the chancellor of Laurentian University in Sudbury.

In 2006, The Agenda replaced Studio 2 to save money, he explained. "One anchor was cheaper than two."

When TVO's current CEO, Lisa de Wilde, announced the cancellation of Studio 2, there was a risk this change would alienate Studio 2 viewers, Paikin said.

"Someone [working on The Agenda] asked, 'What size audience will we need to remain on the air?'"

De Wilde responded by saying the show's success would be measured by fulfilment of its mission to educate viewers, he recalled.

"She said our mission was to raise the important issues... and if we're engaging with the issues in depth and in a meaningful way, we'll deserve to be on the air.

"Well it's our 10th season. So far, so good."■

Debut author draws on family's wartime experiences

DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

"I didn't write a novel about the Holocaust but about post-Holocaust trauma and mostly about reconciliation," states Renate Krakauer about her debut novel, Only By Blood.

And the result is a sensitive portrayal not only of the consequences of unbridled racism and genocide, but also of those who choose to be humane and the possibility of putting things right. Krakauer has portrayed these themes not only through well-drawn characters and an action-packed plot but also via relationships that raise questions about identity, love and what one may be driven to do under duress.

A significant part of the story is set during World War II and Krakauer vividly describes the widespread devastation, loss and grief by drawing us into the lives of two Polish families; one Jewish and the other Catholic. However, the tale spans 60 years and travels back and forth between Canada and Poland. Complex and dynamic it reads like a mystery novel.

Though Krakauer is a child survivor of the Holocaust, she says Only By Blood is not an account of her or her family's experiences. She admits that she drew on aspects of her family's history to write the narrative.

> I always thought that women were the unsung heroes of the Holocaust. I realized I wanted to write about a Jewish woman and a Catholic woman, each of whom saved her daughter's life.

Renate Krakauer

Born in 1941, Krakauer was an infant when her parents made the difficult decision to leave her in the care of a Polish woman of their acquaintance, who lived on the outskirts of a village in eastern Poland. She says her early memories are not tainted by war or terror, though her parents' recollections are quite different. Inadequately clothed, always starving, her mother and father hid separately in cramped conditions always under the threat of discovery by the Nazis.

Krakauer was an oblivious three-year-old when the war ended. "It was when we came to Canada that I stopped being happy," she says. She describes herself as, "an insecure immigrant." Though only a school-aged child, she was, "very aware of being different from the general population and the established Jewish population." An only child and bereft of an extended family, the young Renate felt alone.

> For Hitler, if you had one drop of Jewish blood you were tainted.

Meanwhile, her parents devastated by recent losses, had no time to devote to healing. They had to build a new life. They founded their future on the one asset that was not taken from them. University educated Poles, Charlotte and William Tannenzapf had worked in their respective professions (pharmacy and engineering) until the war erupted. Eventually, they were able to use their professional knowledge "to carve out a niche for themselves" in Toronto.

The idea for Only By Blood came to Krakauer about eight years ago when the descendants of her mother's long estranged brother found and contacted her. Sadly, her mother and uncle had died before this reconnection took place. Nevertheless, Krakauer discovered cousins she had long wished for. Yet, what moved her most was that her father, who had vehemently reproached his brother-in-law for becoming a traitor to the Jews during a time of rampant anti-Semitism, was willing to meet his Polish granddaughter and her husband and to pronounce, "I feel an affinity with you."

Krakauer says, "I was amazed. A man of 98 was able to change his mind."

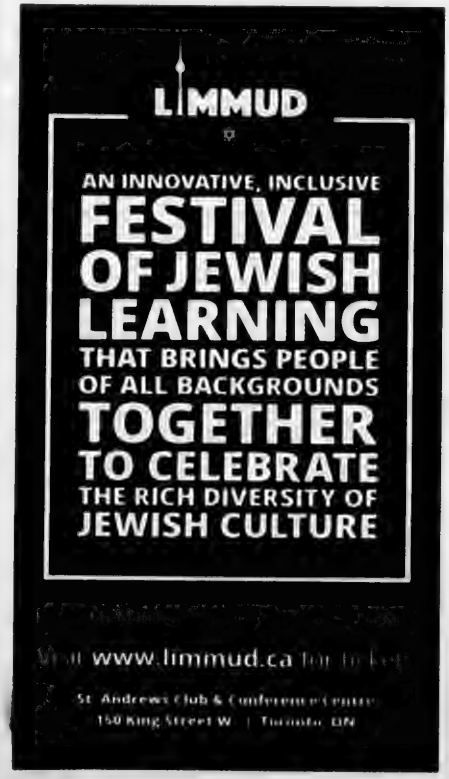
This unexpected event and reconciliation seeded a story that began to take form during writing courses Krakauer took at the Haliburton School of the Arts and Humber School for Writers. Through fiction she explored the meaning of identity and how it is shaped. She also looked at racism and its relationship to identity. "For Hitler, if you had one drop of Jewish blood you were tainted."

Krakauer also felt impelled to examine the lives of women of the Holocaust. "My mother saved my life. I always thought that women were the unsung heroes of the Holocaust. I realized I wanted to write about a Jewish woman and a Catholic woman, each of whom saved her daughter's life." To deepen her understanding of the time Krakauer researched survivors' accounts.

Only By Blood begins in a doctor's office in contemporary Poland. Mania is finishing her examination of an elderly patient who tells her he knew her mother's sister when they were both young and still living in their home village. Mania is stunned by this coincidence. Saddened by the reminder that she has not met her aunt and knows little about her family, she decides to once more try to learn about her family's past when she next sees her mother. However, Mania does not realize her plan. Krystyna, her mother, becomes ill and dies without revealing more about her history. Yet, her dying words are a plea. She asks Mania to, "Find them and make it right." And thus Mania begins her quest.

Mania is the central character of the novel but Krystyna and Rose, a Polish Jew and a survivor, are its subject matter. "Both are strong, competent, loving woman willing to do anything for their daughters," Krakauer says. "However, Krystyna was not traumatized by the events of World War II, as was Rose. Krystyna's losses were self-inflicted. She made choices. Rose didn't make choices. She suffered the loss of her family because she was a Jew. Each woman is guarding a secret."

Yet the story cannot be described simply as a mystery though it is a page-turner. Essentially, one can say Only By Blood is a poignant and compassionate inquiry into human commonalities that transcend religious and cultural differences even under horrific circumstances. ■



A glimpse at the exotic world of horse sport

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Barbara Kay is well known in Canada and beyond as a talented and courageous newspaper columnist. A regular writer for the National Post, she generally espouses a neo-Conservative worldview. Two recent columns were titled "The key to a successful culture? Monogamy" and "Marking the end of a hollow president's feckless record on terrorism," referring to U.S. President Barack Obama. Kay speaks forcefully and occasionally acerbically against the forces of political correctness. For example, a 2014 article of hers was titled "Rape culture and the delusions of the feminist mind." She is a proud Jew and a strong supporter of the State of Israel.

Kay, who has taught writing at the university level in Quebec, has certainly perfected the genre of the hard-hitting 800-word opinion piece. Now she has branched out into a very different genre, publishing a 463-page mystery novel, A Three-Day Event, with 18 major and nine minor characters. (A list at the beginning of the book with short notes beside each name is meant to help readers keep them straight.) The action in the novel takes place almost exclusively in rural Quebec, in the circles of wealthy people who own horses, and their employees who train them for competitions.

Canadian Jews can relate easily to some of the themes and characters in the book. Three members of an affluent Montreal Jewish family play major roles. A gentile spouse is part of the mix, as well as the deceased Jewish father of the family who still looms large and speaks from beyond the grave. A character named Dr. Werzberger, a bit player, described by one gentile character as the "abortion rights crusader... [a] swarthy, beetle-browed, beaked-nosed Jew," is a thinly disguised Dr. Henry Morgentaler.

But most of the novel revolves around the unfamiliar (to most Jews, at least) cut-throat world of horses and people who dedicate their lives to horse competitions.

The mystery involves the murder of an unpleasant person and anonymous acts of violence against horses. More than one character in the book says that the acts of violence against the horses bother them more than the murder. Remarkably, the investigation of the crime is not carried out by the police or a private detective, but by a sub-group of the main suspects.

On her website, Kay explains how she came to write a novel and why it revolves around the world of horse sport: "Many non-fiction writers are curious to know whether they can pull off a work of fiction. I too wondered for decades, but it wasn't until my daughter was betrayed by her mentor in horse sport that I found my inspiration. Suddenly my 10 years of immersion in the fascinating world of high-stakes, three-day eventing competition opened a creative seam I had never thought possible."

To help us cope with all the unusual and unfamiliar aspects of buying, selling, training and riding sport horses, Kay gives us a helpful three-page glossary. There we learn that a "three-day event" is comparable to a triathlon competition for humans, and "combines dressage, cross-country jumping over fixed and natural obstacles, and stadium jumping."

Anti-Semitism hovers in the background of the plot and occasionally moves to the forefront. We are told that the main Jewish character, Ruthie (Jacobson) Cooper, "knew she lived in a Golden Age of tolerance and freedom unprecedented in Jewish history. Naturally she followed the escalating progress of global anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism (almost always invariably one and the same, of course) with concern and apprehension." But only when she was well into her adult years did she directly experience "racial hatred" for the first time and "found it an odd and very unsettling feeling."

A Three-Day Event,
by Barbara Kay,
Peloton Press

> The book provides an insider view of the unusual combination of the more familiar world of Quebec Jewry and the exotic world of horse sport.

All the Jewish characters in the book, including Ruthie's intermarried brother, feel comfortable with and proud of their Jewish identity. They are all wealthy and upstanding human beings. They sprinkle their words with Yiddish terms like mazzik and ziess. They like eating bagels (presumably Montreal bagels).

Kay tells us that Ruthie "knew her history... and was engaged in the collective cultural life of her people." But when you look carefully, the only evidence of Jewish involvement (aside from bagels and the occasional Borscht Belt humour) for her and the other Jews is heightened concern about anti-Semitism and an interest in the Shoah.

Not surprisingly for a novel set in Quebec, language issues are important. (It's useful to know at least some high school French if you read this book, but it's not a problem if you do not.) The choice of which language to speak at any given time is significant. Many of the characters have a high consciousness about language issues. I enjoyed learning from their conversations about the concept of faux amis ("false friends") or false cognates, words that look the same in English and French but have different meanings. (For example, the French déception means disappointment, not deception.)

A surprising aspect of the book is the alignment of the cultural, ethnic and religious groups of Quebec. In this novel, prejudice originates in gentile Anglo circles, both among rich and working-class English speakers, who dislike Jews and French Canadians. The French Canadians and the Jews, on the other hand, get along amazingly well almost all the time. An alignment like this makes some theoretical sense, but is not, as far as I know, the common cultural reality.

In sum, the book provides an insider view of the unusual combination of the more familiar world of Quebec Jewry and the exotic world of horse sport. ■

Cheat yourself happy

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There's no doubt that getting dinner on the table, day after day can be a challenge. Most people have between seven and 10 recipes that they gravitate to, which they know their family will love and that can be made efficiently and well.

I, too, tend to rely heavily on a few hand-picked favourites but I do attempt to try something new at least once a week. That way, my repertoire gets longer and longer and I don't have to wonder, mid-aisle in the grocery store, what the heck I can make for dinner tonight.

I also periodically find that it helps to cheat, just a little. Using canned tomatoes can make a mighty difference to your stress level and to the time it takes to get a meal on the table.

Chicken with tomatoes and pesto

You would never think that just three ingredients could result in a delicious meal, but they do. If you can't find cheeseless pesto, simply combine 2 cups of fresh basil, ½ cup lightly toasted pine nuts, 2 cloves garlic, and about 1/3 cup of really good olive oil in the bowl of a food processor and pulse until fully ground and liquidy, adding up to 2 more tbsp. of oil to achieve the correct consistency.

- ❑ 1 can (19 oz.) regular stewed tomatoes
- ❑ ¼ cup (heaping cheeseless basil pesto
- ❑ 4 boneless skinless chicken breasts

Pour the tomatoes into a large non-stick skillet set over medium-high heat. Bring the mixture to a boil. Boil gently until some of the excess juices have evaporated, about 5 minutes. Dollop the pesto into 4 mounds, about 3-in. apart. Place a chicken breast on top of each dollop of pesto. Reduce the heat and simmer the chicken breasts, covered, for 10 minutes. Turn the chicken breasts over; simmer, covered, until the chicken breasts are cooked throughout, about 8 minutes. Makes 4 servings.

Chickpea and avocado salad sandwich

This sandwich is full of good for you. The chickpeas are an excellent source of manganese, a very good source of folate and a good source of fibre, protein and iron. Avocados are particularly nutrient dense; they contain 20 essential nutrients, including fibre, potassium, E and B vitamins and folic acid.

- ❑ 1 can (19 oz.) chickpeas
- ❑ 1 large ripe avocado, pitted
- ❑ 2 large cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ juice of one lime (about 2-1/2 tbsp.
- ❑ ½ tsp. salt
- ❑ ¼ tsp. pepper
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro
- ❑ 8 slices whole grain bread
- ❑ 3 tbsp. light mayonnaise (optional)
- ❑ 20 thin slices cucumber
- ❑ 4 large lettuce leaves

Drain the chickpeas into a colander and rinse under cold running water. Transfer the chickpeas to a large piece of paper towel and rub vigorously to dry and to remove as much of the skin from the chickpeas as possible. Transfer the chickpeas to a large bowl. Add the avocado, garlic, lemon juice, salt and pepper.

Using a potato masher or fork, mash the ingredients together. Stir in the cilantro. Lay half of the bread slices on a work surface. Spread the mayonnaise evenly over the bread slices, if using. Divide the chickpea mixture evenly over each piece of bread, spreading it lightly. Top with cucumber slices, lettuce and remaining bread slices. Makes 4 servings. ■

#TousAvecUneProblem? France embraces its kippah 'problem'

David Levine

#TousAvecUneKippa continues to spark social change in France.

The hashtag phenomenon (meaning "Everyone in a kippah") was created in January 2016 when, in the aftermath of several violent anti-Semitic attacks, a Jewish community leader advised men to stop wearing their skullcaps in public, "until better days."

The idea was simple: citizens were invited to take and share pictures of themselves wearing kippot in a display of solidarity with France's beleaguered Jews.

In only a few short days, the phenomenon went viral, and photos of average citizens, politicians and celebrities wearing kippot took social media by storm. Many were moved to take the campaign off-line, donning skullcaps in their daily lives and sparking changes they would never have anticipated.

Collette (last name withheld), a 23-year-old nursing student living in Paris, says it was "an honour" to post her first selfie in a kippah: "It was eye-opening. It made me proud to stand beside French citizens under threat, and it led to a ton of new Twitter followers."

The experience left Collette feeling responsible to continue her campaign in the streets – and before she knew it, she wouldn't leave home without a kippah.

"It's a political statement," she says, "but they also look pretty great. I love the velvet ones."

Collette is not alone. In fact, so many French men and women found it hard to take off their kippot that #TousAvecUneKippa has spawned a trend in the world's fashion capital, with decorative, personalized, vintage and ironic kippot appearing on runways and couturiers across the country.

After a few short weeks, Collette found herself in a community of activists and trendsetters who were noticing more and more changes the longer they wore a kippah.

Philippe, 30, is a graphic designer who collects vintage kippot from American bar and bat mitzvah parties of the 1980s.

"At first, it was funny," he says. "I'd order a baguette, they'd give me a bagel. My butcher wouldn't sell me pork."

"I started getting letters from the bank," says Michel, 41, a tattoo artist and competitive slam poet, his eyes welling up, "telling me that my credit score had been upgraded. They never gave me a reason."

Henrietta, 32, found herself growing frustrated at the assumptions she encountered: "A woman walked up to me the other day and said 'I know a young man in Tolouse – Erik – he's also been wearing a kippah lately. Do you know him? Erik? In Tolouse?'

"I nearly lost it. Why should I know some random guy in Toulouse? Because we're both on social media? Does she think we all know each other?"

The incidents keep piling up. Louis, 24, returned to university to find that he had been transferred to pre-med. Louisa, 47, bought an expensive duvet set, only to find holes cut in the sheets.

Predictably, right-wing politicians and pundits began denouncing the group as a fifth column of French society.

"This is how they work," said one pundit. "They own and control the social media, and now they're using it to undermine our democracy.

"I bet Mark Zuckerberg wears a kippah."

As relationships with friends and families grew strained, these non-Jewish kippah wearers began to frequent the few stores, parks, restaurants and churches where they felt welcome – until almost all of them wound up living in a single neighbourhood, which quickly became known as The Twittle (short for "Twitter shtetl").

Thankfully, no violence has yet been reported, but threatening graffiti has appeared in the neighbourhood, promising "No forgiveness for the ones who crucified our values."

There is a silver lining: the situation has been a welcome distraction for France's Jews, who have used the time to remove their kippot, change their names, and integrate seamlessly into secular French society.

"It was a rough few centuries," says Marie Girard (formerly Miriam Greenbaum), "but at least we've gotten rid of anti-Semitism for good." ■

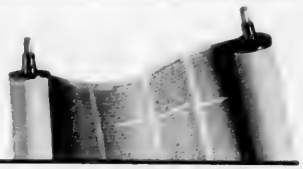
Parshah

Tetzaveh | Exodus 27:20-30:10



Rabbi Aaron Katchen explains why conflict is not a bad thing, so long as it's constructive
Rabbi Michal Shekel interprets the kohen gadol's attire as a call for modesty, humility and piety
Rabbi Howard Morrison considers reasons why Moses' name is absent from this week's Torah portion

Aaron Katchen

"These are the clothes that you should make: the jewelled breast-plate, the ephod-apron…" (Exodus, 28:4)

The Talmud relates a story about a non-Jew who hears this section of the parshah being read from the Torah. Intrigued, he asks who the fancy clothes are for. He is told, for the kohen gadol, the high priest.

Enamoured with the honour afforded the position, the man sought to convert on condition he become the kohen gadol. Shammai chased the man away with a builder's rod. Hillel accepted him and learned with him so that the convert could understand for himself why anyone not born from the priestly line could not be kohen gadol; even someone as great as King David could never be kohen gadol.

This story appears among a number of stories about Hillel and Shammai. Both were giants of Torah and leaders of the Jewish community. They came to represent machloket l'shem shomayim – literally, disputes for the sake of heaven.

This week marked the observance of the Jewish Week of Constructive Conflict (www.9Adar.org), a week dedicated to cultivating a culture of constructive conflict across personal, political, religious and other divides. The week is dedicated to increasing public awareness around the values and skills of constructive conflict as well as awareness of organizations that work to promote these values and skills year round. It is commemorated annually the week of 9 Adar, which marks the day 2,000 years ago that healthy disagreements "for the sake of heaven" turned destructive.

What Hillel and Shammai teach us, and this week elevates, is that conflict is not a bad thing. Pursuing truth is not a bad thing. During the days of Hillel and Shammai, each was able to represent valid viewpoints and challenge each other; their arguments focused on the ideas and not the people. Their disagreements did not prevent them from living as one community. ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen, who is based in Toronto, directs Ask Big Questions Canada in partnership with Hillel.

Michal Shekel

Tradition holds that Aaron was a humble man. This trait, an essential part of his being, was also woven into the very fabric of his clothes. The specifics of the attire of the kohen gadol (high priest) have far greater implications than what the well-dressed high priest should wear.

Take for example one detail of the robe: "On its hem make pomegranates of blue, purple and crimson yarns, all around the hem, with bells of gold between them all around." (Exodus, 28:33) What is the purpose of the golden bells? Do they function to announce the arrival of the high priest before God, do they remind him to maintain a spiritual mindfulness as he performs his sacred duties, or, is their sound a reminder for us, stirring us to seek holiness?

Isaac Arama, writing in Akedat Yitzkhak, finds great significance in the bells. They were placed between the pomegranates, fabric ornaments that muffled their sound. While the tinkling of the bells proclaims holiness and piety, muffling the sound teaches that we should not go around declaring how pious we are. Secondly, placing the bells on the hem of the garment provides a lesson in humility: If something nice is said about you, great, but don't let it go to your head. Be like a pomegranate, more precious on the inside than would be indicated by the outside rind.

Compare this to the pressure placed on us today to "toot your own horn." You are nobody unless you have a public presence, exaggerating and boasting of your accomplishments. We participate in this chaotic din because modern success depends on it.

By adorning ourselves in a virtual set of priestly attire we can experience a different measure of worth, one that values modesty, humility and piety. Best of all, one size fits all. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ont.

Howard Morrison

From the time the Torah records the birth of Moses, Parshat Tetzaveh is the only portion that does not explicitly mention his name. Twice it says "you," referring to Moses, but the name never appears.

Reasons abound. Since the parshah focuses on Aaron and his priestly sons, it is as if Moses asked to have his name removed so that full honour would go to his brother and nephews. Another rationale suggests that when Moses pleaded with God to be removed from the Torah following the sin of the golden calf, his name was removed from this parshah. Yet another posits that since the yahrzeit date for Moses, 7 Adar, always surrounds this parshah, the name of Moses is missing to accentuate the sadness of this week on the Jewish calendar.

Appropriately, Jewish communities honour the sacred work done by the chevra kadisha (religious burial society) during the week of Parshat Tetzaveh. In a leap year, some defer that honour to the week of 7 Adar Bet, the additional month. The chevra kadisha's work with the deceased from death through burial is called chesed shel emet, the most truthful and honourable act of kindness that one can perform for another.

In life, when we perform acts of kindness for another expecting no reward, the other party may, nevertheless, reciprocate. However, the acts of kindness of a chevra kadisha cannot be reciprocated by the other party of blessed memory.

The explanations and practices associated with the omission of Moses' name in this parshah teach us many values: we should be humble. Our name need not stand out when doing the right thing. We should bestow honour on others when they are deserving. We should appreciate the acts of ultimate kindness performed by members of the chevra kadisha, who receive their due recognition during the week of the yahrzeit of Moshe Rabeinu. ■

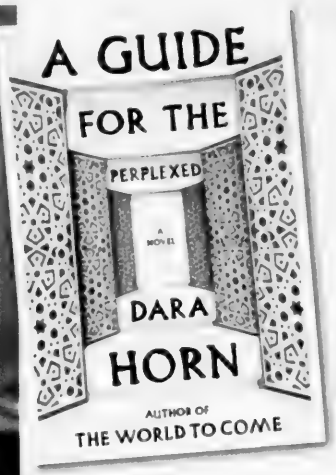
Dara Horn: novelist explores memory and history

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Dara Horn



Accomplished Jewish studies scholar and author Dara Horn received her PhD in comparative literature from Harvard University in 2006, studying Hebrew and Yiddish. Before that, at 25, she published her first novel, In the Image, which received a 2003 National Jewish Book Award, the 2002 Edward Lewis Wallant Award, and the 2003 Reform Judaism Fiction Prize. She was chosen by Granta magazine as one of 20 "Best Young American Novelists" in 2007. Her fourth and latest novel, A Guide for the Perplexed, was selected as one of Booklist's Best Books of 2013 and was long-listed for the Carnegie Medal for Excellence in Fiction. Horn spoke to The CJN in advance of her Feb. 10 lecture at Holy Blossom Temple about some of the concepts explored in her latest novel, including memory, history and mortality.

Can you tell me about the book and the ideas in your lecture?

My most recent novel is the story of a software developer who creates an app that records everything that its users do. But there is also a historical component that is about the discovery of the Cairo Geniza, which was this massive trove of about 190,000 medieval documents that were discovered in a storeroom of a 1,000-year-old synagogue in Cairo. It was discovered by the scholar Solomon Schechter in the late 19th century, and the reason I put these ideas together was because as a writer, I've always been fascinated by how memory works. This goes back to my childhood, when I thought, wouldn't it be amazing if we could write down everything that ever happened to you and never lose any of this time that is leaving us out of our lives every day? Now, thanks to social media, my childhood dream has come true and turned into a nightmare where every idiotic thing I do is recorded forever and ever.

Normally, a geniza is for documents that had God's name on them, because they can't be thrown away, but this community in Cairo, they saved everything that had Hebrew letters on it. So you can imagine, this wasn't just Torah scrolls. This was things like a sales receipt, love letters, children's homework, business inventory, medical prescriptions. What's amazing is that some of them were these valuable documents – valuable because they were written by someone famous. Maimonides' drafts of his original Guide for the Perplexed were found there, and Maimonides was actually a character in the novel, because part of book goes back to the time of Maimonides, and he is a character in it.

This was not an archive, this was a medieval Facebook. It was crammed with so much mundane junk that you could reconstruct an entire world from it. So this question of this data storage then and now – what we save and why we save it –one of the things I was exploring through this book was this question of what memory means in modern times.

What are some of the concepts in your book that relate to the way we remember and document moments?

The contemporary plot of the book is actually a rewrite of the Joseph story from the Torah, but with women characters instead of men. A lot of it is about this woman's relationship with her sister.

A lot of it is about the dynamic between the sisters, which relates back to the question of data and memory, because siblings are kind of this ultimate test of how we remember the past.

That dynamic is what gives the theological dimension to the Joseph story in the Torah, because when Joseph reunites with his brothers at the end of the story, he says to them, "Don't be angry at yourselves that you sold me to into slavery, because it was to save your lives and God sent me ahead of you." He is basically rewriting the history – and it was true, because he being in Egypt was the reason they were able to survive the famine, because he does this food-rationing program. But it's also true that he is looking back at this negative family history and understanding it in a new way.

A lot of the book is about the question of memory versus history, how the way we choose to remember the past and how we understand the past and how we define ourselves through the past and our understanding of the past.

Will social media platforms that allow people to record every moment of their lives change the way we document history and how we decide that something is noteworthy?

Because of the advent of social media, it changes who becomes, and who we consider, as important in our society.

A museum will typically only display about 10 per cent of the works that it owns, because there is only so much space on the wall. What a curator's job to do is to select works from that enormous collection and to frame them and exhibit them in a way that tells a certain kind of story. In different times, those stories are going to be different, even if we're looking at the same material. The way we understand the past is going to change our beliefs and the decisions we make about how we choose to understand that past.

Will our modern obsession with documenting all the mundane aspects of our lives help or hurt the human experience and the way we remember the past?

What I find is that there is usually a generational divide where older people say, "Well this is too much, and we have to make decisions about what we keep, what we save," while younger people are much more cavalier about it and say, "Oh we just take seven million pictures and save everything on my phone and don't even bother printing them off and selecting them."

The reason why older people would have greater discomfort with it is because older readers are more likely to have the experience of packing up a deceased parents' house or downsizing or packing up a child's room after they've grown up and moved out.

The reality is, we have to contain our ancestors. Genetically, we contain our ancestors. That is the obligation that mortality imposes upon us, this requirement that we curate our ancestors lives.

Young people are also immersed in a more fleeting time of life, where changes are more constant. "I just graduated from college and now I'm moving on to my first job." Everything is much more compressed, whereas an older person is more likely to be living in the same place for a longer time, having more stable relationships. Also young parents, and I am one – I have four small children – are very aware of the fleetingness of their children's lives.

A lot of this is a fear of mortality. So much of what we post online are these fleeting things. Whether it's something as casual as here is a lunch that is about to get eaten, or something like a baby who is going to grow up, this is an attempt to fight mortality. ■

The enigmatic Franz von Papen and the crystal vase

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

No Weimer-era politician played a greater role in placing the crown of tyranny on the brows of Hitler than Franz von Papen. And yet he was a man of irreconcilable contradictions, for no sooner had he engineered Hitler's appointment as chancellor in 1933 than he expressed serious doubts about the excesses of Nazi terror. Von Papen almost paid with his life for that affront during the Night of the Long Knives, when friends and associates were murdered, but he ultimately remained loyal to Hitler's Germany.

Von Papen served the Third Reich with distinction as ambassador to Austria and Turkey, but was free of personal animosity toward Jews. He faithfully supported Nazi policies of the deportation of Turkish Jews in France by advising the Turks not to interfere in these matters, but worked with the Vatican's Apostolic Delegate to Turkey, to save Jews. During the Nuremberg trials, he inadvertently admitted that he knew about the deportation of Jews from France, but later stated that as a devout Catholic his conscience could never have accepted the mass murder of Jews.

This was the man who walked into my father's store of ornaments and tableware soon after his appointment as Reich ambassador to Ankara on a bitterly cold day in November 1939. He had done his research – he knew that my grandfather, Aron Araf Effendi, was the secular head of the Jewish community of Ankara and that my father, Elijah Araf, spoke fluent German. Elijah was speechless. He had attended the Olympics in Berlin in 1936 and knew that the times were hard for German Jews.

They chatted for a while, and von Papen bought a blue crystal vase for a returning diplomat at the German embassy. After that visit, the von Papens became regular customers and other members of embassy also shopped at Elijah's store.

At the time, the Araf clan lived in a mansion opposite the synagogue in the Jewish Quarter of Ankara. Based on the recollections of my relatives, the house had a courtyard redolent with the harmonies of an Andalusian garden. Sensuously ornamented arches, sun-washed ivory white plastered walls seducing the changing colours and shadows of the day, receding soft rounded edges, cupola crowned portals supported by mosaic embroidered columns – all embracing the effervescent fountain.

The fount was embedded in a rainbow-coloured floral enclosure displaying winter aconites, snow drops and wind flowers intertwined with eruptions of hyacinths and inevitable darling roses of the East. The Sephardi oasis, in the shadows of two thorn trees, was surrounded by a horseshoe-shaped three-storey building crowned with orange cream coloured terracotta tiles.

They were nine brothers and sisters: Vitali and Daniel were doing their military service; Joseph, the youngest brother, was studying law at the university; Virginie, the eldest daughter had married, but Elijah, Rachel, Perla, Rosa and Eliza lived at home with Aron and his devoted wife, Karen.

The last time Elijah saw von Papen was in Karpich Baba, the only restaurant of quality in Ankara, in the company of a man of the cloth whom we identified, years later, as Giuseppe Angelo Roncalli, the future Pope John XXIII who was then serving as Apostolic Delegate to Turkey. Just as Goering had saved von Papen's life during the Hitler purges, Roncalli too saved him from the noose, as he testified that the German diplomat had worked with him to save Jews during the war.

In the final analysis, was von Papen a suave, aristocratic and cultured Dr. Faust who fell into the web of Mephistopheles' blandishments? Or was he Mephistopheles masked as Dr. Faust?

Heinrich Heine may have provided the answer:

"I called the Devil and he came
And then I saw with a wandering gaze
He was not hideous, he was not lame
But a genial man with charming ways,
A man in the very flush of his prime,
Experienced, suave and in touch with his time,
As a diplomat, his talent is great,
And he speaks wisely of church and state." ■

Sara Blumenfeld

December 25, 1927– February 2, 2016

With profound sadness and heavy hearts we announce the passing of Sara Blumenfeld on February 2, 2016, following her courageous medical battle. Sara was predeceased by her husband of 55 years, Sam, sister Hannah, and parents, Mandel & Rachel Mayer. She is survived by: children Dalia, Ray and Miriam, grandchildren Zachary, Jessica and Ben, great grandchildren Nathan, Benjamin, Sadie and Mackenzie; brother Rubin, sister-in-law Clara, their children Faye, Norman and Sam, and their families; as well as sister-in-law Bianca and the Blanaru families. Sara is also mourned by Gary, Jason, Julia, Carol, Sym, Kathleen, and numerous family and friends in Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, and Israel

Born in Romania in 1927, Sara and Sam immigrated to Canada in 1953, escaping the horrors of World War II and were part of the movement of refugees who took part in Israel's fight for independence in 1948. Their story is similar to many Jewish immigrants who arrived in Canada to start a new life and raise a family in a land of opportunity, free from religious persecution. They arrived in this country with very limited resources and had to learn to adapt to a new land, a new culture and a new language. Their drive and determination which had held them so well throughout their young lives translated into success in their new home land.

The quiet but strong matriarch of a large and extended family, Sara was the rock that held the family together through good times and bad and supported her husband Sam in all of his endeavours. Sara and Sam travelled extensively and she delighted in the memories they collected over the years from trips throughout Canada, the United States, Israel and Europe. Many happy hours were shared by the family looking at photos and reminiscing about long car trips, many great meals and wondrous sights.

Sara loved to entertain and her household was the site of countless family dinners and happy celebrations. Her ability in the kitchen was revered and though many tried to duplicate her delicious chicken soup or fabulous chocolate cake, few were able to meet the challenge. Sara's creativity and perseverance was shown in the large and extraordinary needlepoints she sewed which were proudly framed and hung on the walls of the family home. An intelligent, strong, kind, thoughtful, compassionate, and determined woman devoted to her family and her friends, Sara was well read, loved watching movies and was amazingly adaptable to whatever situation she found herself. Her legacy and her memory will be carried on by the growing family she deeply loved and the many friends she touched throughout her remarkable life.

The family wishes to thank and recognize Sara's daughter Miriam for the devotion, love, friendship and assistance she unselfishly provided her mother. Appreciation and gratitude are also extended to Dr. Claudia Petrescu, the entire Amica Thornhill community whose compassion and friendship undoubtedly enhanced and enriched Sara's life, and the staff of 8West and the ICU at North York General Hospital.

An intimate funeral service and gathering of respects was held. If desired, donations may be made to the charity of your choice in honour of this truly elegant and beloved lady.

Delivering over 22,000 babies each year creates many challenges for Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

The hospital opened a new Neonatal Intensive Care Unit (NICU) in 2014 which is state-of-the-art, and the largest in Israel, to respond to a growing demand for lifesaving care in order to treat more than 60 babies at a time.
Of the 130 low birthweight babies born last year, 57 weighed less than a pound.
Low birthweight babies struggle to breathe and depend on a respirator to sustain life.

Donations to the 100 Days of Giving Campaign were used to benefit the purchase of a respirator for our most fragile patients.

Applause has set the bar in kosher catering

ELLA BURAKOWSKI
CJN STAFF

The collective gasp could be heard through the room as all our heads turned to see a row of professionally dressed, white-gloved servers entering the dining room carrying trays filled with white teapots, a cloud of thick steam escaping from each spout to create a magical mist floating above as they entered the room. The band played, as one by one, the teapots were placed in front of each guest. What an entrance for mango sorbet, which perfectly cleansed our palates in preparation for the next course. And all this after we had already been treated to one tantalizing course after the next.

From mouth-watering hors d'oeuvres, to the salad, which was presented like an exotic floral arrangement, to the succulent main course whose heavenly aroma could be sensed before it was placed artistically in front of each guest, this meal from start to finish was nothing short of a culinary experience.

Applause Catering has set the bar in kosher catering to a level that's unreachable for others. Every course engages all the senses as each plated masterpiece is set down in front of each guest. Every mouthful is a celebration and a burst of unexpected flavours that would please the most discerning palate. There were as many photos taken of the food as there were of the bride and groom.

What's the secret of this innovative, upscale kosher caterer?

Roshan Wanasingha, award-winning chef/partner of Applause Catering has never felt limited by what's available in the local market, and he doesn't let the restriction of being kosher limit his imagination when it comes to creating the perfect meal. His innovation and creativity have put Applause at the forefront of kosher catering.

Cary Silber, a partner in Applause Catering has many years of experience and understands the needs and desires of his clients. "We'll source products from around the world to make things different," he said. "We don't put ourselves into a box, we work outside of the box," he explained. "We'll use almond milk, soy milk, or other pareve ingredients that make it kosher. We can make a cream-based sauce pareve. We can do a pasta bar at a meat function where we give you good-tasting cheese and a creamy sauce."

David Silber, also a partner in Applause Catering and representing the next generation, brings his expert knowledge of the event industry to Applause Catering. He imparts his passion and attention to detail to ensure excellence. When it comes to evaluating what's popular in terms of food choices, you can trust David.

His brother Ryan Silber displays a zest for perfection and innovation with his research and knowledge of the most up-to-date trends, coupled with his fresh approach to what's new and possible.

"The experience that I have, I bring with me," Cary said, "and these guys are young and are foodies. We put those factors together and end up with a company of experienced foodies."

He enjoys being able to share this ride with his sons and has been able to fuse his 30 years of his experience with his sons' avant-guard contemporary visions.

"I'm able to impart a lot of my experience to them, so that when they're talking about catering or doing events, my experience comes into play," Silber said. "So even though they're young, their experience is rich. They started to work for me as dishwashers and worked their way up. They understand the business."

The beautiful wedding we attended is one I will not soon forget.

Applause Kosher Catering was the perfect complement to an enchanting evening at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto. Its culinary vision and expert execution of each and every detail captured the essence of the evening and added to the perfection of the simchah, creating a special memory that stayed with every guest in attendance. The bride and groom had their dream wedding and Applause Catering played a big part in that magical evening. ■

Can bridal fashionista turn Israel into the dress-up nation?

KAREN MCDONOUGH
JNS.ORG

It's already known as the "start-up nation." But can bridal fashionista Berta Balilti turn Israel into the dress-up nation?

Balilti, owner of Berta Bridal, presides over an internationally successful business, creating luxurious and glamorous wedding gowns sold worldwide. From her fashion house in the southern Israeli port city of Ashdod, she exports gorgeously detailed gowns to boutiques and stores in more than 20 countries.

This isn't your mother's wedding dress. Balilti is known for her shapely modern designs with signature daring bare backs, dramatic trains, and intricate lace and tulle.

She has certainly found her place in the multi-billion dollar wedding industry – $60 billion a year in the United States alone. And with the worldwide appeal of her designs, Balilti's spot as a high-end wedding gown designer has helped place Israel at the top of bridal haute couture fashion.

"There's nothing like Berta's dresses," said Renata Kukielka, the buyer for L'Fay Bridal in New York City. "She has brought something unique to this market, classic and sexy designs. Brides try her dresses on and most are in disbelief, they feel so gorgeous they don't want to take them off."

Balilti's success may have seemed unimaginable just a generation ago. Born in Cairo, Egypt, she emigrated at age three with her parents to Israel just prior to 1967's Six Day War, which had devastating consequences for Egyptian Jews. Years earlier, some of her family migrated to Paris with the help of the Jewish organization HIAS before coming to America.

Growing up in Israel, Balilti found her flair for fashion and dreamed of designing the ultimate dress for a woman's most important day. After graduating from Ramat Gan's Shenkar College of Engineering and Design, she worked during the day as a seamstress, and later, as a junior designer at a ready-to-wear company in Tel Aviv. At night, she sketched and sewed wedding gowns at home, determined to make her dream come true.

In 1995, she opened her first bridal salon, La Belle, a small shop where she was the sole designer and had a staff of about 25 people working for her. From the beginning, her business has been closely held, with family members helping out. Her daughter is one of her models.

Less than a decade later, in 2004, Balilti expanded – moving her operation into a larger space, turning her boutique into a full-fledged fashion house, and taking on the name Berta Bridal.

"We had reached a point in which I felt like the place became too small for my needs, in terms of production and the level of service I expect my team to grant my brides," Balilti told JNS.org. "Then we decided to move to our new place."

By 2005, the company had 15 retailers, and a year later more than 30 stores were carrying the Israeli-made gowns. A few years later in 2012, when her son-in-law Nir Moscovich joined the team, he took the company international, overseeing its global operations.

"Everything happened really fast in the international scene," she said. "We were constantly getting inquiries from brides and many retailers all over the world who wanted to carry my line."

Today, her gowns are sold at more than 60 retailers in close to two dozen countries, including in the U.S. department store giants Saks Fifth Avenue and Nordstrom. Though she has made her dream come true, Balilti isn't complacent.

"I still chase my dreams," she said. "I'm grateful for all I have achieved so far, but there's much more ahead, and I have no plans of taking a break." ■

Hidden Thornhill treasure

Those looking to find items to enhance their upcoming weddings and simchahs, will find quite the treasure hidden in an industrial part of Thornhill, looking most unassuming.

Celebrating its 10th anniversary later this month, The Israeli Source shows no intention of resting on its laurels.

"Last year we reported a doubling in options available to customers looking to order kippot for their simchahs," says Chuck Elnekave, proprietor of The Israeli Source.

"Since then, we've almost doubled again."

With an absolutely jaw-dropping 500-million-plus kippah options, The Israeli Source's team of experts is well-versed in the various options available.

"Different fabrics, linings, shapes and sizes – so many options, there's just no reason why anybody can't have something unique," Elnekave elaborates. "One couple might be happy with the ubiquitous black suede kippah for their wedding. It's formal, reserved, and something that guests will likely use for years."

He remembers, however, a couple who came in wanting something different. "They showed me their wedding colour scheme, and they left with magnificent chocolate brown linen kippot with a minty green lining – it looked like someone had taken a bite out of a peppermint Aero bar! I absolutely love working with someone with an abundance of creative energy."

Kippot are not the store's only focus. Ketubahs and benchers are also a huge part of its repertoire.

"We work with most of the ketubah artists, big and small," says Elnekave, "and our commitment is to provide their works – the same pieces one can get from a fancy gallery – at the price for which The Israeli Source has become famous. With a large array of artists, The Israeli Source's roster of ketubah designers features some of the most sought-after, in-demand artists in the market today.

"And The Israeli Source is definitely the go-to spot for benchers," Elnekave says.

He proudly boasts of his work with the Birkat Hamazon booklets given out at many simchahs. "Not only are we competitive in pricing, and offer a great selection, we can offer turnaround times that would have been unheard of a few years ago.

Israeli Source has 500-million plus kippah options.

"But ultimately," says Elnekave, with a grin on his face, "what I'm most proud of, is what we can accomplish in terms of social and community benefits."

The vast majority of the kippot The Israeli Source offers are made in Israel. "With the situation the way it's been the past few months, we hear from studios in Israel how stores there suffer from a lack of tourists and that trickles down to a drop in production for them. So we're thrilled to be taking orders that give them work to do."

What advice would Elnekave give to those with upcoming simchahs? "As soon as you're ready, place your orders. We've seen, unfortunately, a rise in prices because of the weak Canadian dollar. Most articles from the foreign exchange experts seem to agree that the situation will get a bit worse before it gets better. Given that just about every kippah, bencher, and ketubah comes from suppliers who sell in U.S. dollars, it's best to place orders before prices jump again." ■

The Israeli Source is located at 60 Doncaster Avenue in Thornhill, and can be reached at 905-482-2025.

Thank guests personally for their gifts

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

With so many things to do between planning a wedding and settling down after the honeymoon, couples may be tempted to put off sending out thank-you cards. Opinions vary on the content of the messages or the means of communication, however, everyone agrees it is courteous to express gratitude without undue delay.

In the digital age, couples tend to set up wedding websites soon after they announce their engagement. These sites invariably include photo galleries, blogs, videos, links to bridal registries and other news. The celebrants may opt to email invitations to prenuptials and organize web posts to make announcements and acknowledge good wishes.

Although some people use online communication for everything connected to the occasion, many continue to order personal wedding stationery and send out stamped, addressed formal invitations and RSVP cards. In addition, they complement the order with thank-you cards to have on hand.

Author Peggy Post, an institute spokesperson for The Emily Post Institute, renowned for setting standards for etiquette practices in North America, sets three months as the maximum grace period before sending out thank you cards. She lauds personalized thank-you notes. She does not advocate shortcuts such as phoning and emailing. Moreover, purists lack enthusiasm for thank- you cards conveying the same message to everyone on the list.

Retired social worker Ann Gold, 68, moved to Montreal from New York in the '60s. "Between my children, grandchildren, former colleagues and friends, I'm invited to lots of simchahs. I send lots of gifts and I don't complain if recipients thank me by email or phone. Of, course, I prefer a handwritten personal card but even if it's an impersonal printed one, as long as I'm alerted that they received the gift, I'm satisfied."

Graduate student, Avery Levy, 26, advocates scrapping printed invitations, thank you cards and sending anything by regular mail. "It's the 21st century, online access is simple, free and quick."

Gold and Levy wish more celebrants would express thanks within a month after they received gifts. "In one instance, I couldn't place the name of the bride and groom on the thank you card because so many months had elapsed since the wedding," Gold said. "Fortunately, I made the connection a few weeks later when I was seated near them at a relative's bar mitzvah."

Levy and Gold have learned not to assume that gifts sent out automatically arrive in the right hands. "I was in a rush and parking was tough, so I left the gift, which was clearly addressed, with the doorman in the condo lobby," Gold said. "The next day, I saw the couple at the supermarket and asked if they received the gift. Evidently, the doorman had neglected to inform them it had arrived. Luckily, it had been safely locked away and they were able to retrieve it. Now, I make sure to check right away."

Experts offer the following tips on how to effectively acknowledge wedding gifts.

For starters, make a list of everyone invited to prenuptials and the wedding. Leave plenty of space to add names when unexpected gifts arrive from social or business acquaintances who were not on the invitation list. Note full personal and, if relevant, business names and co-ordinates. Describe the item, the source and date it arrived. Include a column to check off when thank you cards have been sent out.

Recipients of handwritten messages appreciate the personal spin on each acknowledgement. "It makes me feel special," Gold observes, "especially when people write something complimentary about the particular gift I sent them. If it's monetary, some even indicate what it is going toward." ■

Honeymoon in Québec City

ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Honeymoon choices can take newlyweds to far flung destinations from Bali to Barcelona, but for couples looking to stay a little closer to home while experiencing history, charm and time for relaxation, Québec City fits the bill.

Referred to as the crown jewel of French Canada by the travel experts at Lonely Planet, Québec City is a short car, train or plane ride from many Canadian cities. The drive from Montreal, at a distance of 255 kilometers, will get you there in just under three hours on highways 40 or 20.

As the capital of the province of Québec, Québec City's roots trace back to the extensive travels of French explorer Jacques Cartier in 1535 and the establishment of an official colony in New France by Samuel de Champlain in 1608. With its origins in the fur trade along with the logging industry, Québec City saw many battles between the English and French within its walls particularly on the Plains of Abraham, now a beautiful park enjoyed all year long by locals and tourists alike.

Québec City's Vieux Québec, (Old Town) is the only remaining fortified city in North America outside of Mexico. In 1985, it was named a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

Today's Québec City successfully blends old architecture from the 16th and 17th centuries with modern office and government buildings, which straddle the majestic north shore of the St. Lawrence River as it intersects with the St. Charles River heading towards the Atlantic.

As a major centre for French culture, the city is brimming with many museums including the Musée de la civilisation, and the Centre d'Interpretation Place-Royale, a historic museum featuring a dress-up costume room. The Fine Arts Museum showcases the largest collection of Québec art in Canada.

The Québec Winter Carnival has taken place every February since 1954 with a full roster of activities for young and old. For a ski honeymoon, Mont Sainte Anne and Stoneham ski centres are a short drive away. Romantic, fully appointed accommodations are plentiful, from the famed Chateau Frontenac with a view over the river basin, to familiar chain hotels and unique bed-and-breakfast choices.

The uniqueness of Québec City with its walled fortifications has earned its name as a UNESCO World Heritage Site. ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN PHOTO

Dining is an art featuring exceptionally well prepared French cuisine along with more and more ethnic choices and locally sourced wines and cheeses. Famed French joie de vivre is evident everywhere along the walkable cobblestone streets of Vieux Québec through to the modern shopping centres located not far from the city centre.

A side trip to the famed Montmorency Falls is a must in the warmer months where the cable car takes you close up to the falls allowing for jaw dropping views of the St. Lawrence River and surrounding mountains. Hop up on a restored cannon, or ride the funicular from lower town to upper town for special honeymoon photo memories. Take a romantic caleche ride to learn more about this historical city.

Shabbat services are held at the city's Beth Israel Oheve Sholom Orthodox Synagogue. Chabad house is situated on the city's Université de Laval campus. Kosher catering services are available through the synagogue with delivery to many of the city's premium hotels. ■

Choosing the perfect Ketubah

Authorized reproductions of historical ketubahs from The Jewish Museum.

MICHAEL SHAPIRO

Finding the right Ketubah for your wedding can feel overwhelming. If you type "Ketubah" into Google, you get about 391,000 results! With so many artists, vendors, styles and texts, where do you begin?

These days, most couples choose a fine art Ketubah print with a design they love and a text that suits their ceremony. By following a few easy steps, you are well on your way to finding the Ketubah of your dreams.

What is your style?
Contemporary or traditional? Vibrantly colourful or quietly subdued? With lots of Jewish symbolism or none at all? If you like the idea of owning a true classic, consider an authentic historical reproduction of a centuries-old Ketubah from New York's Jewish Museum – updated with your names and preferred text. You can find your style from a wide range of Ketubahs on the market today, including papercut, gold leaf, 3-D and Japanese washi paper.

What size fits?
A Ketubah is most often displayed in the living room, dining room or bedroom. Ketubah prints are available in a variety of sizes. Do you envision a Ketubah that's big and bold, classic-sized (about 18 in. x 24 in.) or small and understated?

Which text is right?
To ensure smooth sailing at your wedding, you really do need to consult your rabbi or officiant about any text requirements they may have. Your Ketubah provider should offer a variety of possible texts for every wedding type – or you can write your own!

What's your budget?
It's common to spend one per cent to two per cent of the cost of the wedding. In most cases, an heirloom-quality, limited edition print or lasercut Ketubah should cost $300-$500 (Cdn) all in. If you have a larger budget, enhanced options such as stretched canvas or gold leaf are worth considering. With less to spend, a budget ketubah may be just the thing.

Planning tip:
If considering ordering from the United States, beware of the hidden costs. The prices tend to be similar – before you take into account the exchange rate – and you may be surprised with a big extra charge upon receipt for taxes and customs clearance. (And happily, the largest selection of Ketubahs is right here in Canada).

What's your timeline?
Ideally, your Ketubah should be ordered two to three months before your wedding. If your timeline is a bit shorter, no problem, although your options may be more limited. In a pinch, a reputable artist or ketubah company should be able to provide a Ketubah in as little as a week. When shopping online, look for a "Time to Door" calculator that specifies the timing for each Ketubah. If your wedding is this weekend, phone a local company that has in-house printing and discuss your options with a live person.

Make the broken glass moment last a lifetime

MAAYAN JAFFE-HOFFMAN
JNS.ORG

"Im eshkachech Yerushalayim, tishkach yemini." If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

Boom. Crush. Crackle. The final step of a Jewish wedding's chupah ceremony is the moment that the groom steps on the glass to shouts of "mazal tov!"

There are countless interpretations for the tradition of breaking a glass. Some see it as a reminder of the destruction of the First Temple of Jerusalem. Others say it is meant to remind us that marriage is as fragile as glass. It also has been interpreted to demonstrate how life is so fragile that the couple should enjoy every day as if it were their last together.

"Can you imagine – you can take a perfectly formed object and smash it....We are so perfectly formed as we stand under the chupah. It is true that life is fragile and sometimes fragmented, but HaShem [God] responds to a broken heart," says Chana Perelman, director of Judaica.com.

Whether progressive or traditional, religious or secular, Jewish weddings almost always include the breaking of a glass.

At some weddings, and certainly historically, people used light bulbs or wine goblets wrapped in cloth napkins. Today, however, there are many artists designing vibrant, trendy, and often hand-blown Jewish wedding-breaking glasses, and ultimately imaginative keepsakes in which to keep their shards.

Perelman says it was artist Gary Rosenthal who popularized selling beautiful breaking glasses. She highlights the breaking glasses of artist Sara Beames, who produces two different lines of glasses to smash – eight colours in hand-blown glass and five that come in an embroidered "Ani l'dodi v'dodi li" (Hebrew for "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine") silk organza bag.

Yet Perelman says the real joy comes not necessarily during the moment of the breaking, but when the couple decides to keep the glass.

"Assign a reliable person – family member or friend – to take care of getting the glass from under the chupah. The last thing you want is for it to get swept away by the hall," says Perelman.

What can you do with those shards? Here are seven ideas:

BOX IT UP

If you choose a dynamic breaking glass in a vibrant colour, simply boxing the shards in a Lucite or glass box can be a real attraction. The box can sit on a bookshelf or be displayed on a countertop. The box can be purchased at a craft or jewelry store. Keeping such a box around, says Perelman, reminds the couple of that happy "mazal tov moment."

BAG IT

Shari Klein created a keepsake to help engage her to-be step-children in the wedding ceremony. Today, it beautifies her new home. It was a do-it-yourself project. She purchased an off-white muslin bag with a drawstring and fabric crayons. The children – two boys, ages six and eight – were asked to draw what they felt depicted the special day on which their dad would marry his new wife.

"When we brought it to the chupah, the rabbi was able to acknowledge it, and it made the boys feel good and included," says Klein, explaining that now they are planning to frame the drawing with the glass and put it up in their house.

USE IT FOR A MITZVAH

Artist Faye Miller tells JNS.org that among her most popular keepsakes are mezuzahs and kiddush cups. Beames says tzedakah boxes are among her hottest buys. Broken glass from a wedding can be incorporated into any of these items.

"My personal favourites are keepsakes that help you perform a mitzvah," notes Perelman, who says these types of wedding keepsakes sell well on Judaica.com. She says a couple can place the tzedakah box by their candlesticks and give tzedakah as a family every Friday evening, collecting from their children as the family grows.

DESIGN A PIECE OF JEWELRY

The bride can take a piece of glass and commission a keepsake piece of jewelry. A search on Etsy.com reveals a lampwork necklace from the broken glass of a Jewish wedding, created by Sari Glassman, who explains on the product page that she melted the pieces from the broken glass in the flame and added to them a 22-karat gold leaf.

"Do you know a woman who wants to get married? This necklace will bring her luck," writes Glassman though it will also be a piece to cherish for a woman who has already married her soulmate.

CREATE POTTERY

Perelman recommends embedding wedding glass shards in a piece of pottery. One can visit a paint-and-glaze store and ask to use the glass as part of a mosaic pottery project, or commission an artist to create their ideal piece.

Search for another craft idea, or come up with your own!

Pinterest is an excellent platform for finding creative ideas for what to do with your broken wedding glass shards. Put "broken glass art" in the search bar and you'll find everything from mirrors, to mosaics, to glass bottle collectibles, to garden stepping stones.

Faye Miller says it's a joy to work on breaking glass keepsakes.

"I think the glass shards themselves are beautiful, and the fact that they harken back to the earliest days of the Jewish people is very meaningful," says Miller. "How wonderful to have a piece in your home that evokes memories of our people as well as the special moment when you became husband and wife. I love my job and consider it an honour when brides and grooms select my art for their wedding glass." ■

Rocker joins Jewish gun rights group, and Texas inmate lays tfillin

Ted Nugent sorry for 'offensive meme'

Ted Nugent joined a Jewish gun rights group after apologizing for posting an image on Facebook that blamed prominent U.S. Jews for gun control. Nicki Kenyon of the Zelman Partisans said last week that Nugent, 67, accepted the group's honorary membership offer. The right-wing 1970s rocker was rapped by Jewish groups for posing a graphic Feb. 8 that included Jews such as former New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg, Chicago mayor Rahm Emanuel and New York Sen. Chuck Schumer branded with Israeli flags. Kenyon said Nugent isn't an anti-Semite and that he apologized to him for posting "a nasty and offensive meme."

A bar mitzvah on death row

A Jewish inmate in Livingston, Texas, who's been on death row for 15 years, put on tfillin for the first time earlier this month with the help of a Jewish chaplain. Rabbi Dovid Goldstein, director of Chabad-Lubavitch of West Houston, met Jedidiah Murphy a few months ago while visiting another inmate and spent three months getting permission for him to lay tfillin. Death-row inmates can't have direct contact with visitors, so Murphy put on the phylacteries behind glass under the rabbi's direction. Murphy was raised by Jewish grandparents, but entered foster care before age 13 and never had a bar mitzvah. The pair marked the milestone with chips and soft drinks. Murphy shot and killed a 79-year-old woman when he was 25 and used her credit cards to buy alcohol and cigarettes while high on cocaine.

Some of his best friends are Jews (with guns).

Serbia adopts Shoah restitution law

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors and Descendants (CJHSD) joined the World Jewish Restitution Organization this month in welcoming a new Serbian law that will address heirless and unclaimed Jewish property expropriated during the Shoah. Its the first such law passed since Serbia and 46 other countries endorsed the 2009 Terezin Declaration on Holocaust Era Assets and Related Issues, which called for restitution of heirless Jewish property. The CJHSD called it "a vital first step" in getting signatories to fulfil their restitution pledge. ■

Keeping Jews Jewish

In "Keeping the next generation Jewish," (Feb. 11) rabbis Lisa Grushcow and Daniel Korobkin overlook one demographic fact. The main supplier of people to the non-Orthodox movements are the formerly Orthodox. The larger Orthodox birth rate have always supplied more Jews to the non-Orthodox movements than those lost to assimilation.

All Jewish denominations have their roles within the Jewish People in preventing assimilation loss. Without non-Orthodox movements, there would be a far greater loss.

Eric Mendelsohn
Toronto

I feel compelled to respond to Rabbi Lisa Grushcow who opines "It is possible to take Judaism seriously without being within the context of Halachah."

Judaism exists because the Hebrews were taken from Egyptian servitude to Mount Sinai and given the gift of Torah, a system of laws, morals and beliefs, and thereby became Jewish. The early fervour with which they embraced their new lives threatened to burn out Moses and led to the establishment of the Sanhedrin.

The totality of Torah and rabbinic law is Halachah, and adherence to these precepts defines us as Jews. Not all of us are observant, it's true, but I do not understand how we can abandon the primary tenets of our religion and still be Jewish. Those who believe that it is possible are merely Jew-ish, and their grandchildren will be secular.

'No one need suffer alone'

As a member of the Jewish community and a mental health advocate, I was pleased to be present at this important event, but also simultaneously dismayed ("Panel on depression and suicide 'strikes a chord,'" Feb. 11).

While society is working hard to address stigma associated with mental illness, it saddens me that the catalyst for this event was suicides in the Jewish community. Given that one in five Canadians are affected by mental illness, chances are that we, or someone close to us, are suffering. However, no one need suffer alone and in silence.

I hope that this event will open up a plethora of conversations, formal and informal, large and small, with the hopes that we can build a community of awareness, understanding and hope.

Rachel Cooper
Toronto

Equity issues are on the table

I read the letter from people concerned with Jewish social justice ("Rekindling the light of Jewish social justice," Feb. 4), many of whom I know and admire, with some consternation.

They were implying that the organized Jewish community is not adequately involved in social justice issues. They failed to recognize the vital work undertaken by our federations, which raise funds for social justice work undertaken by professional agencies within the community. The writers also omitted the important work of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the advocacy arm of the federations. CIJA advocates to government at all levels on issues such as affordable housing, food security, services for people marginalized by their emotional, intellectual or physical challenges, protections for those targeted for hate (including the transgendered community), and poverty reduction policies.

While social justice work is usually not highly visible, it is vital for the general well-being of the community. I think that the federations and CIJA would welcome the volunteer participation of these thoughtful social justice advocates.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Inspirational books for the beach

If you were stranded on a desert island and could only take 10 Jewish texts with you, which ones would you choose?

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: There is a popular British radio program called Desert Island Discs, which asks famous politicians and well-known members of society to discuss their favourite songs. I would like to introduce a spinoff: Desert Island Texts.

Rabbi Splansky, If you were stranded on a desert island and could only take 10 texts with you, which would you choose, and why?

Rabbi Splansky: I've heard it said that rabbis really only have one sermon in them. We each have one core text and "riff" on it over and over again. I don't believe it. But maybe 10 core texts each.

If I were forced to choose, I might include Hillel's great balancing act: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? If I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?" (Pirkei Avot 1:14) Every lifetime is spent in search of fulfillment. Everyone wants to be good. Hillel's simple questions help to clarify the choices we make day by day.

If I were stranded alone on a desert island, I'd be better off asking these questions and doing my best to answer them.

Rabbi Fishman: I would like to introduce the possibility of taking an entire genre – that of the midrash – with me to the island. We have just come off the reading of Parshat Mishpatim, and in a fabulously important comment (21:2), Rabbi Shimshon Raphael Hirsch writes that the written Torah without the commentary of the oral Torah is practically a closed book. Each needs the other in order to fully understand what the text means.

I personally take this approach with midrashim on the narrative sections of the Torah, too. The legends, interpretations and the sometimes fanciful other aspects beneath the surface are Torah as well. When I teach my classes, I heavily rely on the interplay between both worlds – the text and the interpretation – to better understand Torah.

Rabbi Splansky: I never heard the radio program, so I don't know the rules of the game. Are you cheating when you take an entire genre of Jewish literature with you, rabbi?

I also delight in the rabbinic imagination and find midrashim are our finest teaching tools. Perhaps we should pack the phrase that says Torah "is not in Heaven nor is it beyond the sea… It is very close to you, in your mouth and in your heart, that you may do it" (Deuteronomy 30:12-14).

This would be encouraging on a desert island. Creativity, interpretation and even improvisation have allowed Jewish life to flourish (or at least endure) in every time and place. Remember when Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon inquired about the proper time to make Kiddush in outer space?

On an uninhabited island we might ask "How do we study Torah?" The answer might be by pivoting the text at every angle until all 70 facets are gleaming in the sun.

Rabbi Fishman: If I had to choose one narrative, it would be the story of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. I never tire of teaching the story, and each time, I find greater levels of depth contained between the lines.

For me, this is a story of birth, maturation, temptation and failure. Yet, the story concludes with the optimistic stance that expulsion from the garden is our challenge to find our way back. With this backdrop, the Garden of Eden is not so much something humanity is given on a silver platter, but rather something that we earn through our own efforts, and ultimately something we can make for ourselves here on Earth.

Rabbi Splansky: The Garden of Eden narrative is hopeful, but it isn't joyful. One thing I know I'd need on a desert island is a joyful text to lift my spirits.

I may even pack up the chassidic rule of thumb: when in doubt, hum a niggun and think it through again. When fearful, hum a niggun – one beat for every step forward. When uplifted, raise your voice until, like Jacob, you "pick up your feet" (Genesis 29:1).

This was a fun start. I look forward to welcoming you to Toronto for our first Rabbi2Rabbi Live event. All are welcome to join us and CJN editor Yoni Goldstein for discussion and debate of Desert Island Texts on March 10. ■

Looking back at the Liberals' first 100 days in power

Earlier this month, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and the Liberal party marked 100 days in power. It has been a busy time for the new government, filled with major policy decisions and more than a few reminders that the Trudeau Liberals do not intend to conduct business like the Harper Conservatives who preceded them. That reality is being felt acutely in the Jewish community, where reaction to the new government has been decidedly mixed. Consider some of the early Liberal decisions that have been particularly felt among Canadian Jewry:

• Syrian refugees: The Jewish community has been at the forefront of the effort to bring refugees from war-torn Syria. At the same time, many Jewish Canadians are concerned about potential security threats posed by refugees and have argued that Canada would be better off welcoming non-Muslim refugees, like the Yazidis, instead. With nearly 10,000 refugees still to arrive in Canada under the Liberal plan, it will be some time before we can determine which side is right.

• The United Nations: Early in its mandate, the Liberal government voted against a set of anti-Israel resolutions at the UN. More recently, there have been indications that Canada is vying for a seat on the Security Council, which routinely bashes Israel while ignoring serial human rights abusers and warmongers. If its early voting pattern is any indication, the Liberals might be able to act as a voice of reason at the UN. But if this government reverts to the earlier Liberal practice of abstaining at the Security Council, it will only embolden the Israel haters.

• Palestinian aid: In 2013, the Harper Conservatives cancelled Canada's aid to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA). Now, the Liberals are considering restoring that funding. UNRWA's tainted history – including harbouring terrorist infrastructure and employing people with a decidedly, and public, anti-Israel bias – should cause the government to seriously consider whether re-funding UNRWA is the best way to help the Palestinians, and the prospects for peace.

• BDS: As reported in this week's CJN, the Liberals are supporting a Conservative resolution denouncing the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement. The resolution calls on the government "to condemn any and all attempts by Canadian organizations, groups or individuals to promote the BDS movement." Trudeau has been firm in his anti-BDS stance for some time, so whether or not the Conservatives backed the Liberals into a corner on this resolution, as some have suggested, this is clearly a win for Canadian Jews, and the State of Israel.

During the election campaign, Trudeau was adamant that Canada's policy vis-a-vis Israel would remain unchanged under a Liberal government. Since the election, though, others in his government, including Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, have proven that there has nonetheless been a shift in tone. Within the Jewish community, some have argued that these two realities are not mutually exclusive – that friends can be critical of each other from time to time – while others pine for the days when Canadian Jews and Israel could count on Canada to have its back at all times. After 100 days, it's clear things have changed. What remains unclear is to what extent. ■ — YONI

The folly of Ottawa's 'Hijab Day'

Sima Goel

Sima Goel

Muslim women who wear a hijab, do so because they believe it is a religious obligation.

An organization in Ottawa called the City for All Women Initiative (CAWI) is asking Canadian women in the nation's capital to offer support for the hijab, the head covering worn by many Muslim women. On Feb. 25, the group is holding an event titled, "Ottawa Hijab Solidarity Day" and is asking non–Muslim women to wear the hijab at Ottawa's city hall that day in a show of solidarity with their Muslim sisters.

As a non-Muslim woman who was forced to wear a hijab, this event brings back terrible memories for me. I was born and raised in Shiraz, Iran, and after the rise of the Islamic government, I was forced to wear a hijab. I was neither a supporter of the new regime nor a Muslim, and I bitterly resented having to hide my hair and comply with the new restrictive policies. But disobeying the rules was not an option for me. All women had to adhere to the same policy, without debate, and disobedience was met with severe consequences, such as arrest and the fear of being assaulted by acid-tossing vigilantes.

Although not all Muslim women wear the hijab, those who do, wear it because they believe it is a religious obligation. I have yet to meet a non-Muslim woman who wears the hijab as a form of cultural expression in Canada. However, I have met many devout followers of Islam who say that the hijab is not a required tenet of their faith.

Canada is a diverse, multicultural society, where many religious and cultural groups live together peacefully with mutual respect for each other's customs. Indeed, when Quebec's provincial government first proposed its controversial charter of values, I spoke out against the clause that limited the right of individuals, in specified circumstances, to wear symbols of their religion. Even so, I cannot abide the idea that non-Muslim Canadian women should demonstrate support for our Muslim sisters by wearing a hijab. The hijab is a reflection of religious beliefs – it is not a fashion statement.

Jews do not have a "Wear a Kippah Day" to support Jewish men. Sikhs never demanded a "Turban Day" to support Sikh males. So why have a "Hijab Day"?

Any Canadian woman can wear the hijab if she sees fit, just as any Sikh male can wear a turban. Canada is a free country, and Canadians have the right to live according to their own dictates, religious beliefs and social customs. Our laws have clearly established this. In this context, I cannot understand why we should gather and demonstrate our solidarity for a garment that is guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I have many Muslim friends and I am eager to know their customs but they never asked me to cover myself in solidarity for them.

New immigrants and refugees come to Canada for many reasons. Many find themselves caught between the traditions and culture of their homeland, and liberal Canadian attitudes. There is no question that coming to a new country can be difficult. I know. I have stood on both sides of the immigration line myself.

As Canadians, it is crucial that we remain faithful to the rights that are entrenched within our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. All forms of religious expressions are equal and none require special treatment. I am grateful that in Canada we have the freedom to express ourselves as we please, in contrast to the countries that make it mandatory for women to wear religious symbols, regardless of their belief.

My personal history with the hijab makes it impossible for me to accept covering my hair. I will forever identify the hijab with the repressive tradition of the Iranian Islamic government, which used its dominance of religion to control its people. I encourage Muslim women all over the world to promote their culture and identity – and I will gladly eat at their table, sing a song of celebration, and rejoice at their success. Nonetheless, to suggest we endorse their religious beliefs by wearing a hijab is unreasonable in this country, which has so clearly promoted the rights of minority members to live as they please.

I welcome my hijab-wearing Muslim sisters. But I refuse to wear the hijab as a prerequisite for their solidarity. And for the same reason, I would never dare ask them to remove their hijab in solidarity with non-Muslim Canadian women. In the end, my values are no more important than theirs. And after all, isn't that the Canadian way? ■

Victor Goldbloom proved the value of interfaith dialogue

Montreal Renaissance man spent his life building bridges between communities without ever trying to impose his views on others

NORMA BAUMEL JOSEPH MONTREAL

A man for all seasons. Renaissance man. A mensch. All of these expressions are appropriate descriptions of Victor Goldbloom, who passed away Feb. 15 at the age of 92.

He was without doubt a great man. In all of his pursuits, as a professional or volunteer, he was exceptionally accomplished and successful. With deference and dignity, he took on diverse responsibilities that often put him in roles outside of his comfort zone, even outside of his various communities' accepted norms or public values. But he had a vision of the virtuous and the just. He had a dream of a good world, and he pursued that to our benefit. Without fear or posturing, without trying to impose his views on others, he quietly and steadfastly proceeded to engage in good acts and establish relationships with others in the world at large.

The biographical details are fascinating. Like his father, Anton Goldbloom, Victor was a pediatrician, a caring doctor who made house calls. He took care of children by learning to listen to the young ones, by discarding the surface appearance and delving deeply into signs, symptoms and history that the child could not express. Letters indicate repeatedly just how gentle he was with children.

Victor was talented in his vocation and in applying these professional skills to his other concerns. He transferred that gentleness to adults, even to his opponents. These gifts of his worked well in the world of politics, which he entered in 1966. He worked on the environment, the 1976 Montreal Olympics, conservation and in other communal, social and political venues.

But his most outstanding contributions may have been in the field of inter-communal connections. He titled his autobiography Building Bridges, for that is what he did. He worked with the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews to foster dialogue, and he worked to protect and foster the French language. Both of these activities were not easily undertaken.

A dedicated public servant, a loyal community leader

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Dr. Victor Goldbloom, the first Jewish Quebec cabinet minister, public servant, interfaith dialogue pioneer and eloquent Jewish community leader, died of a heart attack on Feb. 15 at age 92.

A physician by profession, Goldbloom was active and in good health until his sudden passing, his family said. Indeed, he intervened vigorously at the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada conference a week before his death.

"The Jewish community of Canada has lost a beacon and one of the most outstanding leaders of our time. It was a privilege and honour to know Victor and to work with him in my role as chair of CIJA. His contribution to the Jewish community both in Quebec and Canada will continue to be remembered well beyond his passing," said David Cape, national chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Premier Philippe Couillard called Goldbloom "a great politician."

"We have lost a man admired by one and all, and a politician committed to bringing communities closer together," he stated. "Dr. Goldbloom's inspiring career greatly influenced Quebec, in particular when he became the first environment minister. I would also like to stress the influence that he exercised, and will continue to exercise, on an entire generation of politicians and committed leaders."

Born in Montreal on July 31, 1923, Goldbloom was the son of Dr. Alton Goldbloom and Annie Ballon and grew up in the downtown Golden Square Mile. He studied medicine at McGill University and followed in his father's footsteps, becoming a pediatrician.

In addition to his choice of career, Goldbloom said he learned from his father that the best way to combat anti-Semitism was to be fully engaged in society.

After practising medicine for some years, he entered provincial politics in 1966 as the MNA for the newly created riding of D'Arcy McGee in West End Montreal. He was re-elected three times.

When Robert Bourassa's Liberals took power in 1970, Goldbloom was named Quebec's first minister of the environment and was responsible for the province's first environmental protection act.

Bilingual education key to understanding each other

Mira Sucharov

Critics of Zionism point to Israel's Jewish and democratic identity as an oxymoron. There's the adage, attributed to member of Knesset Ahmed Tibi, that Israel is "democratic toward Jews, and Jewish toward Arabs." Avrum Burg, long part of the Zionist establishment, now speaks (most recently in a Partners for Progressive Israel podcast) of the need to end "Jewish privilege."

And in reporting on the Israeli Labor party's recent convention, Ha'aretz columnist Gideon Levy wrote, "One says Jewish and another says democratic, and all together they fail to understand that the two concepts massively contradict the other."

While the occupation arguably impugns Israel's democratic character, and, despite the pessimism that imbues more and more expert analysis each day, Israel could still withdraw from the West Bank and remain intact in its national project. But the criticisms issued by Tibi, Burg, Levy and others cut to the heart of Israel's national identity.

One of the main ways democracies transmit their values is through education. Unlike a melting-pot model where minorities are expected to acculturate to the hegemonic majority, Israel does encourage its Palestinian minority (now numbering roughly 20 per cent of the population) to educate its children in Arabic. There is an Arabic school stream alongside three Hebrew ones: state, state-religious and independent (haredi).

But there is a soft underbelly to this hyper-multiculturalism. While Arabic-speaking parents are in no danger of having their children lose academic and cultural affinity with their own language, there is a troubling lack of cross-contact between children across the Arab-Jewish divide. This also means that while Palestinian citizens of Israel naturally become fluent in Hebrew (since it is the working language of the country), the reverse is not the case. Few Israeli Jews speak Arabic. (An added issue is the frequent complaint from Palestinian lawmakers that they are not sufficiently included in shaping their own Arabic schools' curriculum, including around contentious issues of Palestinian history.)

As reported in +972 magazine, on Feb. 12 a group of parents from Jaffa – a historically mixed Arab-Jewish section of Tel Aviv – protested at Tel Aviv's City Hall to demand bilingual education through Grade 2. These parents chanted, "The Other is Me!" Signs were held aloft in Hebrew and Arabic. One sign said: "Want to find an end to the conflict? The solution lies in education." (In Hebrew, it rhymes.) Like the Hand in Hand community – an independent network of schools representing 1,000 students and for which parents pay nominal annual tuition, these parents want a school that honours all three religions and both languages equally.

Ha'aretz columnist Akiva Eldar, has written about Hand in Hand, where his grandchildren attend. The school is also featured in Dane Elon's powerful documentary film P.S. Jerusalem.

Hand in Hand attracts a particular group of idealistic parents who value bilingualism and multiculturalism. But the powerful thing about public education is that it shapes attitudes in democratic directions, even among citizens who are reluctant to embrace the Other in their midst.

Those Jaffa parents are probably wise to start small: demanding bilingual education for the early years only. But what if a groundswell of support was encouraged for Israelis to consider their children's education as a portal into deeper cultural understanding across the cultural, linguistic and political divide? What if every Israeli was guaranteed to be raised bilingually, with a sensitivity toward the Other that can only come from cross-cultural immersion?

Rather than see a country with a frustrated linguistic and cultural minority, we might see a country where Hebrew and Arabic – and the historical experience of both Israelis and Palestinians, one alongside the other – are elevated to represent a new model of Israeli identity. Girded by internal Israeli-Palestinian understanding, this new Israel would be better poised to seek peace and coexistence with whatever form a post-occupation West Bank one day takes. ■

Affordable Jewish education counters poisonous anti-Zionism

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Some 25 years ago, the word "continuity" entered the Jewish lexicon of buzzwords, becoming a term of great communal significance and concern. This followed the 1990 American Jewish population survey, which painted a disheartening demographic, cultural and religious portrait of the Jewish community. In a North America flowing with the milk and honey of affluence, freedom and abundant personal choice, increasing numbers of college-age Jews were drifting to the margins of their people.

Alarmed at the breaks in the ethereally forged chain of inter-generational continuity, community leaders throughout North America mobilized. There was a great deal of work to do to stem and perhaps even repair the fractures in the precious connective links that bound past to present and future. And indeed much effort has been undertaken to try to bring young Jews back to where they once stood: in the midst of a gratifying sense of belonging to our wonderful, if sometime maddening, people.

Some 40 years ago, in November 1975, the UN General Assembly declared Zionism to be a form of racism. Despite the subsequent rescission of the declaration, that vile calumny has been continually repeated. Israel's very existence has been constantly brought into question. In effect, the UN became the incubator for the seeds of enmity and hatred toward the Jewish state that have ripened today into full-blown forests of poisoned fruit.

At the same time that our young people were entering universities and colleges, campuses were roiling with all manner of morally muddled ideologies, "politically correct" attitudes, and, indeed, revolutionary zeal that lionized individuals like the stubble-bearded leader of the PLO, Yasser Arafat, as an exemplar of noble higher purpose.

No discussion about the manner in which Israel and its supporters are treated on campus can be conducted without the unhappy acknowledgment that ugly anti-Semitism and anti-Israel invective have encroached everywhere. And no community in North America – including in Canada – has escaped the effects of the poison inhaled by our Jewish youth, mostly without antidote, for 40 years.

Many of our children on the margins of Jewish literacy and Jewish identity, wanting simply to find a comfortable place for themselves among their peers on campus, have internalized and even accepted some of the lies, false images and distortions about Israel and the Jewish People that are now standard discourse in certain quarters.

We understand that Jewish students might wish simply to avoid the anti-Israel flags waving constantly in their faces. But that Jews themselves would be the ones in the forefront waving those flags is as distressing as it is painful. Recently, for example, we read of an alumna from Oberlin College, an acclaimed liberal arts school in Ohio, who lamented "the multiple times the Holocaust was referred to as 'white on white crime' by my hip white Jewish peers." Imagine: the Shoah being dismissed as mere "white on white" crime and thus diminished in its impact and historical importance!

The antidote to the poison our children are being exposed to, of course, is the reliable anti-toxin of Jewish history: education. Enabling our youth to know who they are – through access to sustained, formal and informal education about Judaism, Israel, Jewish culture and our shared history – will fortify them and enable them to reject and refute the distortions and hatred that inundate them.

The independent Jerusalem-based think tank, Jewish People Policy Institute made this very same point in a recent essay. "The clear policy implication of newly mined data on Jewish education, consistent with a long research literature, is that Jewish schooling matters. The creation, expansion, and effective marketing of excellent, attractive, and affordable Jewish educational non-Orthodox day school programs and supplementary school programs for teenagers, is an area where communal intervention can make a measurable difference in the quality of American Jewish identity and the transmission of Jewish identity to the next generation of American Jews."

The point bears repeating: affordable Jewish education matters. ■

We need to think beyond the short term

Rabbi Jay Kelman, CA, CPA

Planning for the future is something most of us have difficulty doing. We are psychologically wired to value the present over what may occur in the future. This helps explain many of the bad habits that afflict us such as smoking, overeating or lack of exercise. It also helps explain why so many neglect saving for tomorrow as they overspend today. We tend to ignore the implications of today's decisions for tomorrow.

David Chilton in his best-selling book, The Wealthy Barber, has as its core theme the notion that you must "pay yourself first." When we wait until the end of the month to invest our savings, we generally find there is little or nothing left to save. But if money is taken off the top and directly invested, we "miraculously" discover there is money left for savings.

This reality is the basis of the forced government saving plan known as the Canada Pension Plan, which theoretically ensures that we put away some of our earnings for those years when we will no longer be working. Yet, for many, what they may receive from the government is not enough and the expectation is that these payments will be augmented by personal savings, especially for the 50 per cent of Canadians who do not have an employer pension plan.

Unfortunately, far too many Canadians face a retirement at poverty levels. In a report released on Feb. 16, the Broadbent Institute noted that fewer than 20 per cent of those between 55 and 64 without a private pension plan have saved enough for retirement, and 32 per cent of those have less than $1,000 in total retirement saving! An additional 23 per cent have less than one year's worth of financial resources needed to supplement government pensions.

Whatever the reason and whoever is responsible, this is an astonishing and frightening number. Millions of Canadians are facing a future of great economic hardship, one that will impact on all of us. It is this failure to save that lay behind the government of Ontario's plan to introduce a provincial pension plan.

This is not a problem that affects only individuals. One of our new prime minister's primary election promises was to run an annual deficit of some $10 billion, with the notion of balancing the books pushed off to the end of his mandate. I will let economists debate as to whether our economy can afford this, or even if the deficit should be raised further to help stimulate the economy, something the government has confirmed will be the case. However economic feasibility does not mean this is prudent.

"Who is wise?" our sages ask. "One who envisions the consequences of today's actions, tomorrow." Imagine if the federal government had not racked up an accumulated deficit of some $600 billion. And that's before the hundreds of billions of provincial debt are added. While some of that may have been justified economically during times of recession, most of that debt resulted from calculated political decisions devoid of economic rationale and moral leadership.

What I find sad is the notion that government spending must always increase, with politicians debating only the extent of the increase. The idea of cutting back on spending no longer enters the political discourse. The only finance minister to do this in memory is Paul Martin, who courageously slayed an annual deficit of some $50 billion. In doing so, he set Canada on a course of great financial stability – one that allowed Canada to weather the financial crisis better than any other.

It takes a great political leader to think beyond the short term. It is the inability to think long term on both an individual and a collective level that risks creating years, perhaps generations, of financial pain for millions of people. That such should be the case in a country as rich as Canada is inexcusable. ■

Sharing space at Judaism's holiest spot

Norma Baumel Joseph

This month Reform and Conservative communities rejoiced at the announced Israeli decision to transform conditions at the Western Wall (Kotel).

Israeli and Diaspora Jews have been seeking accommodations from entrenched rabbinic authorities for their so-called divergent forms of liturgical and ritual activities. The new plans for pluralist prayer locations seem to allow for something other than the strict interpretation of Judaism that has been practised by the Orthodox rabbinate of Israel until now. Or that is the presumed claim.

As many of you know, I, and the group Original Women of the Wall, which I am part of, are opposed to this compromise. But while previously I stated in this column my reasons for opposing Anat Hoffman's sell out of WOW, and her conflict of interest as a paid employee of the Reform movement, I want to address the issue of the Kotel itself.

The Kotel is a national shrine in Israel. It belongs to the entire Israeli nation. It does not belong to any one sector or denomination. In the past, before 1967, it was a place individual Jews came to pray, to present themselves and their needs before God in a place they considered holy, a place sanctified by tradition and history. They stood side by side, men and women. It was never a synagogue, never a place of communal prayer.

After the Six Day War, that changed. Israel declared it a national heritage site. It was placed under the directorship of a man who was appointed as an administrator, not a rabbi of a synagogue. Regrettably, this new compromise reduces it to just another haredi synagogue. The administrator now becomes an Orthodox rabbi in charge, able to restrict all who appear, even to deny Jews such as myself from lighting Chanukah candles there.

By accepting this plan, they are not increasing pluralism, just decreasing shared spaces. The Benjamin Netanyahu government is in fact legitimating the rabbinate's overextension of authority. When did that become a victory for pluralism?

> The Kotel does not belong to any one sector or denomination.

Along with many others, in kindergarten, I learned the lessons of sharing. We entered a space such as the sandbox and were taught that we could not take all the toys or build all the sandcastles. We had to let others have some of the pails and shovels. Other children needed to build castles. Sharing was fair and might even be fun. We could learn from others. But most importantly, it was right, just, and the only way to live in a joint space.

How then, we do not impose that lesson on this "compromise"? How can the ultra-Orthodox community escape the aspiration of shared space or fairness because of its claim of traditionalism? Do they hold all the cards?

I think not. It is time we recall that they are not the only ones in the sandbox. It is time we acknowledge they are not the only inheritors of our tradition. In fact, we can argue within Halachah that there are divergent interpretations of Torah. Israel is a democracy and its sacred spaces belong to all Jews. Many, including Orthodox rabbis, have opposed the compromise, have opposed changing the status of the Kotel and its heritage status.

Significantly, Robinson's Arch is not a Kotel. Should a space be used that will destroy an archeological garden? Or possibly upset a political balance with Jordan or the Waqf (Muslim religious authority)? What is this decision going to accomplish? Who is benefiting? And how much money will it cost? The haredim will be happy to see the "others" gone. But why shouldn't they accept sharing the space, the Kotel that is really sacred itself.

It is incumbent on the government to stand with its legal tradition and not allow the heritage site of the Kotel to be dismantled. It is incumbent on the government of Israel to promote its own legislative and democratic principles. ■

FSWC cautions students about York over divestment issue

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) is cautioning Jewish students against enrolling at York University if the school's faculty association becomes the latest group to join the YUDivest campaign, which calls on York's board of governors to divest from investing in arms manufacturers.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) issued a statement Feb. 18 following news that the executive of the 1,500-member York University Faculty Association (YUFA) voted Feb. 12 to endorse the YUDivest Coalition, made up of groups including Amnesty International at York and Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), to urge York to divest from arms manufacturers, such as Lockheed Martin, BAE Systems, Northrop Grumman, FLIR Systems, and Textron.

Jewish community groups and some York faculty believe that although this campaign doesn't openly single out Israel, it is part of a "backdoor" boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

"The motions and calls to support divestment are couched in the language of human rights and peaceful protest – language that is in no way reflective of the hostile and intimidating atmosphere faced by Jewish students on the York campus every day," said FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo.

When asked if he feels Jews are truly unsafe at York, Benolo said, "That's like asking if someone who is verbally abused if they should stay in a relationship. In terms of emotional or social support, York is certainly not a safe space for the majority of Jewish students, whose complaints of threats and intimidation have been neglected for years by the York administration and the student union that should represent them and their interests."

Carl Ehrlich, the director of York's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies, who serves on the YUFA executive as a stewards' council representative, feels that "there is a lot of wool being pulled over people's eyes.

"I do think many people who have signed on [to the YUDivest campaign] were completely innocent of any knowledge of the background and what the purpose behind this is."

Ehrlich explained that he delivered a speech at a stewards' council meeting on Feb. 5 to draw attention to the YUDivest Coalition's roots in the BDS movement.

In 2011, Excalibur, York's campus paper, reported that the YUDivest campaign was founded by SAIA to urge York to withdraw its endowment and pension fund investments from companies that manufacture components for Israel's F-16 Falcon fighter jets or supply Israel's military with computers.

"In the report, SAIA says that by investing in companies that manufacture weapons 'used to kill and maim Palestinian civilians,' York may be complicit 'in the commission of crimes under international law,'" Excalibur reported.

Despite Ehrlich's efforts, YUFA's executive voted 11 to 1 in favour of the YUDivest endorsement motion.

Carl Ehrlich

It will now return to the YUFA stewards' council on March 4, and if it is endorsed there again, YUFA will become one of the more than 70 signatories to the YUDivest campaign, Ehrlich said.

"That is something that I and a number of colleagues, both Jewish and non-Jewish, are trying to avoid, because we don't believe that our faculty union should be taking a divisive political stance on behalf of our diverse faculty," Ehrlich said.

YUFA president Richard Wellen said the association concluded that the campaign was about a "broad-based general issue not associated with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Wellen said he understands that people are uncomfortable with SAIA's involvement with the coalition, but insisted that YUFA does not support the BDS campaign.

"I'm Jewish, so I'm in the middle of this, really. I don't support BDS. A lot of my Jewish colleagues don't, but some do, so it has actually created a debate within the Jewish faculty around this. People are not that happy with the equation of questioning Israel means you're anti-Semitic," Wellen said.

Hillel York president Natalie Slavat and Ariella Daniels, president of Hasbara at York, issued a joint statement to YUFA that said the BDS movement is "a form of discrimination and is the only campaign which actively promotes the destruction of an existing state." They added that the YUDivest campaign is "academically dishonest, as it does not disclose its ties to the larger BDS movement."

Berl Nadler, co-chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs Toronto, said in a statement that he has been "assured by senior members of York's administration that they already have a robust mechanism in place to ensure socially responsible investment. We expect that York will once again reiterate its best practices policy as it pertains to investing."

In a statement to The CJN, a York spokesperson said the university "has not changed its investment approach, which is considered best practice by the Social Investment Organization and the Coalition of Universities for Responsible Investing. It does not recommend the use of negative screening or divesting from particular companies." ■

Anti-BDS motion supported by Liberal, Tory MPs

plungen@thecjn.ca

Whether the Trudeau government was baited into supporting what Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion called a "divisive" opposition resolution, the Liberals in the end backed a Tory motion that condemns the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement.

The Feb. 18 motion, introduced by Conservative MPs Tony Clement and Michelle Rempel, states, "That, given Canada and Israel share a long history of friendship as well as economic and diplomatic relations, the House reject the BDS movement, which promotes the demonization and delegitimization of the State of Israel, and call upon the government to condemn any and all attempts by Canadian organizations, groups or individuals to promote the BDS movement, both here at home and abroad."

Jewish groups applauded the motion, which was expected to pass this week with the support of the Liberals and Tories, but not the NDP and Green party.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), stated: "A clear, all-party consensus rejecting the divisive BDS movement was reaffirmed in the House of Commons. One after the other, members of Parliament spoke up in support of Canada's friendship with Israel and spoke out against efforts to delegitimize, isolate and discriminate against Israel by advancing the false idea that Palestinians bear no responsibility for the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"The boycott movement does not contribute to peace and is not pro-Palestinian. It is discrimination based on nationality, and it harms both Israelis and Palestinians alike by driving the two sides further apart."

JSpace Canada spokesperson Karen Mock said her organization "opposes all forms of BDS of Israel and all forms of vilification, demonization or delegitimizing of Israel as a state. JSpace supports the motion in Parliament. Although BDS is a non-violent form of protest, it has been found not to be effective and divisive in Israel and Canada."

B'nai Brith Canada's CEO Michael Mostyn stated, "We are very pleased to see that Parliament is recognizing the anti-Israel boycott and sanctions movement for what it is: a discriminatory global propaganda campaign to demonize Israel and the Jewish People."

Stéphane Dion

Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said the parliamentary debate reflects "a general consensus that needs to be heard. There is a sense that everybody is pushing back against BDS... It will send a signal to the community, campuses and other groups that they don't have government support," he said.

The motion comes as a number of jurisdictions in North America and Europe have moved to oppose BDS. In the United States, legislatures in New York, Pennsylvania, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee and Indiana passed anti-BDS motions, while the British Parliament also plans to enact a law outlawing BDS. France passed such laws in 2003.

Canada's parliamentary motion also comes a little more than a year after former foreign affairs minister John Baird signed a memorandum of understanding with Israel that pledged the two countries will "work together to oppose efforts to single out or isolate Israel by developing a co-ordinated public diplomacy initiative to oppose boycotts of Israel, to oppose those who call into question the Jewish state's right to exist and to work to counter the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement."

Despite voicing support, statements by Dion suggested he backed the motion reluctantly. Responding to NDP MP Helene Laverdiere, who asked whether he was condemning the Ontario arm of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), which endorsed BDS, Dion stated: "The government that I represent here chose to vote in favour of it, even though we would have written it differently. I agree with the member that most of the people in the movement are acting in good faith, including many of the organizations, but they are misguided. We therefore support this motion, but we wish to make it clear that we are in no way seeking to limit freedom of expression in Canada or to encourage any kind of bullying one way or the other." ■

Don't sell out Israel for UN Security Council seat, MP says

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Tony Clement

Canada should not seek a seat on the United Nations Security Council if it means compromising its support for Israel, said Conservative foreign affairs critic Tony Clement.

"If turning our back on Israel is the price of admission, I don't think it is worth it," Clement told the annual conference of the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada on Feb. 11.

On that day, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau announced his government's intention to make a bid for a council seat, during UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon's visit to Ottawa, part of his government's broader goal of "re-engaging robustly" with the UN and the international community.

In 2010, Canada, under Stephen Harper's government, failed to win a seat, finishing third during first-round voting in the General Assembly. Canada had held a seat on the council on and off for some 60 years.

Clement said given that rejection, the chances are very good Canada will get a seat in its next foray. "I can't imagine we would not get it, if we don't do something really wrong... This is an easy one for Mr. Trudeau to promise," he said.

Asked what went wrong when his government, in which he was a cabinet minister, tried for a seat, Clement responded: "In the 2010 bid, a lot went wrong, but to make it right would have cost too much."

Part of that price, he indicated, was toning down Canada's support for Israel. "Clearly, we were on the wrong side of many states."

But he does believe Canada must be present on the world stage. "I'm going to say something radical for a Conservative: I think we have to engage in international fora, including the UN. However, it is important that we stand for certain principles." The UN needs reform, he added, and to see that happen, Canada must be at the table.

On the issue of Iran, Clement ranked the Islamic regime as more dangerous to the world than North Korea or Russia.

He believes sanctions against Iran are being lifted too hastily, and a slower timetable would serve to "build confidence" in Iran's intentions. He is opposed to Canada's resumption of diplomatic ties with Iran, as long as it sponsors terrorist groups abroad and has a policy of eradicating Israel.

While it appears to be abiding by the terms of the nuclear deal, Clement said Iran is simultaneously building up its ballistic missile technology in violation of UN resolutions. "This hardly shows good faith... There are a lot of reasons to be skeptical of Iran's intentions."

Clement termed the ending of Canada's air mission in the U.S.-led coalition's fight against the Islamic State "very unfortunate... at a time when Britain, France, the United States and our other allies are seeking to increase pressure... This is not the tradition of the Canadian military. It is not in our security or political interest."

The Canadians were doing an extraordinary job targeting ISIS ordinances while minimizing civilian casualties, he said, in providing air cover for ground troops.

"Increasing training on the ground, near the front, increases the risk – it will attract the fire of [the Islamic State]."

However, Clement is optimistic that in the near future there will be a coalescing of the major players fighting ISIS – as diverse as Russia, the Saudis, the United States and Iran – who will put aside secondary political objectives in the region and work together.

In contrast, NDP foreign affairs critic Hélène Laverdière was ecstatic about the Liberal government's direction in foreign policy, hoping it will be a step toward "repairing the damage made in the last 10 years. Canada's reputation really declined under Harper. We had been and should be actively engaged in the world," she said at the conference, whose theme was "Canada on the Global Stage."

"It seemed the Conservatives did not care about the rest of the world. The result was we lost influence... Today, we need to recover that lost influence. But it won't be quick or easy to rebuild."

Laverdière, a foreign affairs service officer for 15 years before being elected in 2011, said Canada must return to the "honest broker role which enabled us to punch above our weight" in global affairs.

That is especially true in the Middle East, she said, rejecting the Tories' "good guys versus bad guys" approach, particularly to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "It was so short-sighted," she said.

She urged Canada to fully restore funding to UNRWA, which was cut by the Tories and has meant the closure of schools for Palestinian refugees, and said the best way to fight terror is to increase humanitarian aid. ■

JNF Canada pulls event support over Noa performance

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT, VANCOUVER

The Jewish National Fund of Canada has withdrawn its support for an upcoming Yom Ha'atzmaut performance in Vancouver by left-wing Israeli singer Achinoam Nini, who is being accused of supporting the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against the Jewish state.

In a statement, JNF Canada CEO Josh Cooper said his organization is taking a one-year hiatus from its tradition of co-sponsoring the Yom Ha'atzmaut event with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV), "due to the views of the entertainment booked for this year's celebration. The entertainer that has been hired does not reflect nor correspond to the mandate and values of the Jewish National Fund of Canada."

Last June, the JNF's U.S. branch co-sponsored a concert with the local Jewish federation in Cincinnati featuring Nini and Israeli-Arab singer Mira Awad.

When asked where specifically Nini – known as Noa – diverged from JNF Canada's mandate, Cooper said: "JNF/KKL has offices in 48 countries. While we all work together in Israel, we operate independent of each other in our respective countries."

Nini – who has voiced support in the past for B'Tselem, a group that monitors human rights in the West Bank, and Breaking the Silence, which is critical of IDF actions in the territory – steadfastly denies supporting the BDS movement.

Her upcoming Vancouver appearance is drawing some strong reactions.

An online petition titled "Stop Achinoam Nini from performing at our Yom Haatzmaut celebration" had 231 signatures as of last week.

And on Feb. 18, Richmond, B.C., realtor Arnold Shuchat expressed his "complete opposition to the decision to engage the controversial artist" in an open letter to the federation's board of directors and its CEO Ezra Shanken.

"The purpose of a Jewish community event should be to marshal and unify our community as opposed to fragment it," Shuchat wrote on his Facebook page. "It had to be obvious to any reasonable person who might have investigated her political positions that she would be a polarizing figure to many in the community. This decision is a regressive and irresponsible one and should be reversed as quickly as possible to prevent damage to both the reputation and fundraising ability of our federation."

Shuchat's letter was reposted by a group called Vancouver United with Israel. Its only online presence is a Facebook page that as of Feb. 18 had almost 400 likes, up from 35 earlier this month when the Jerusalem Post ran a story on how it denounced the federation for inviting Nini. The Post later removed the story from its website after Nini's management issued a statement denying her support for BDS.

Cynthia Ramsay, publisher of the Jewish Independent, a Jewish weekly in Vancouver, said she's received several letters and emails about Nini. "Every person who's tried to get me to run a letter or has CCed me on an email to federation has the exact – and I mean exact – same two points: she supports B'Tselem and Breaking the Silence, and she's anti-Israel or pro-BDS," Ramsay said.

"No one has provided any evidence... to support their [BDS] allegations, some of which are even nastier and also with zero proof. Because of the wording of most people's emails/letters, I think it's a chain reaction. Everyone's just repeating what they've heard from someone else without doing any research of their own," Ramsay said.

"I think it would be very sad if federation withdrew its invitation or if Nini declined it because of the controversy it's causing, which I think is unmerited."

Shuchat told The CJN that the issue isn't about BDS. "This has been very divisive, because [Nini is] very controversial, she'll offend a lot of people and it was very foreseeable that this would happen. She's polarizing, so it was a dumb decision to invite her... Federation should cancel the engagement and focus on building a cohesive community."

In a statement, the JFGV said it was "disappointed" by the JNF's decision. "JNF has been a valued sponsor our Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration for many years, and we look forward to welcoming them back next year." ■

Study examines Jewish domestic violence on Prairies

sshefa@thecjn.ca

A research study about domestic violence in the Jewish communities in the Prairie provinces is currently underway to learn more about characteristics that may be unique to the way members of the Jewish community experience domestic violence.

"We wanted to find out how domestic violence is perceived in the Jewish community and what happens when people come forward to disclose when they have experienced abuse, so that ultimately, better services and resources can be made available," said University of Calgary Prof. Nicole Letourneau, the lead researcher on the study titled "Assessing Domestic Violence in the Jewish Communities of the Prairie Provinces."

Andrea Silverstone, shalom bayit co-ordinator for Jewish Family Service Calgary, who initiated the study and obtained a grant from the Prairie Action Foundation to fund the three projects in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, predicted, based on 20 years of experience in the field, that the rates of occurrences of domestic abuse are likely the same across Canada for both Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

"What will be different is the way that Jewish women access services and the way that Jewish women stay [in an abusive marriage] or manage the violence in their lives if they are in domestically violent situations... and whom they tell when they are experiencing abuse," Silverstone said.

Background information provided on the survey website shows that there is a tendency for Jewish women to stay up to three times longer in abusive relationships than non-Jewish women, and that Jewish women are less likely to access emergency shelters and social service organizations.

"We're going to take all the data, summarize it and bring it back to the leaders in each community and talk with them about the findings," Letourneau said, adding that the survey is voluntary and anonymous, and takes about 15 to 30 minutes to complete online.

Silverstone said the study aims to understand the "scope, occurrence, attitudes and needs of Jewish women who experience domestic violence in the Prairie provinces. My hope is that this will give us good data and information to both understand what is currently happening and what kind of programming and policy work we as a community need to do going forward to make sure we are properly addressing the need of those who are impacted by domestic violence, and eventually ending domestic violence in the community."

Andrea Silverstone

She said the Jewish Women's International (JWI) Chicagoland Study, published in 2004 in the United States, is "the backbone for this study."

"If the Chicagoland and the JWI study is very different from the experiences of women in the Prairie provinces, maybe it's different in Eastern Canada – I don't know. But if it is the same, I think we can make some extrapolations about this being the experience of Jewish women in North America," Silverstone said.

She said while there are still those who believe the misconception that domestic abuse is not an issue for the Jewish community, general awareness is improving.

"We always say in the domestic violence field generally that we're 25 years into a 100-year journey to de-stigmatize domestic violence. I feel like in the Jewish community, we're 10 or 15 years behind the non-Jewish community. People are starting to say that domestic violence exists... We're getting better, but we're still not where we need to be. There is also a lot of finger pointing. I think there are a lot in the Jewish community [who think] that if you're Orthodox, it's the Reform, if you're Reform, then it's the Orthodox, if you're Canadian, it's the Russians – so I think there is still a lot of compartmentalizing that it's the other parts of the Jewish community, but not my part."

The study launched in early January and the plan is to keep the survey open until May 31. Letourneau said she hopes to get responses "in the thousands," from the roughly 32,000 Jews who live in the Prairies.

To take part in the online study, visit www.surveymonkey.com/r/DomesticViolenceinJewishCommunity. For more information, or to seek support for victims of domestic abuse, contact Jewish Family Service Calgary at 403-287-3510. ■

Spousal abuse victim uses experience to help others

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Domestic violence survivor and expert Philippa Sklaar said although women are never to blame for being abused, they must take ownership of their role in an abusive relationship if they hope to break the cycle.

Speaking to The CJN at the offices of Act To End Violence Against Women, a Jewish non-profit organization that serves female domestic abuse victims, at which she has volunteered since moving to Toronto last fall, Sklaar said she hopes her book, When Loving Him Hurts, will help women unravel "the complexities of abuse," and emphasize the need to look inward to understand their role in the "dance of abuse."

Having been married three times since she was 20, each time to an abusive man, Sklaar has years of experience with domestic abuse.

She was raised in a tight-knit South African Jewish community where the misconception that the Jewish community is immune to domestic abuse flourished, and said she didn't realize that abuse could involve something other than physical violence.

"I had no idea that a majority of abuse takes place without a fist or a hand being raised," Sklaar said.

While her first and third husbands were emotionally abusive, it was her second husband, a South African media mogul, who was "not only violently abusive, but he was also addicted to substances. For the longest time, I blamed the substances every time he hit me," she said.

She recalled an incident while they were on vacation in Thailand. She overheard him having a flirtatious phone call with a woman. When she confronted him, the argument escalated to the point that he hit her.

"He hit me so hard that I fell on the floor… He left me crying into the carpet," she said.

"In the cab on the way to the airport, he put his arm around me and he was apologizing. I felt so important and so special and so empowered. He was telling me how much he loved me, and the lesson I taught him that day was that it was OK to beat me."

She said although she eventually left him, she didn't examine her first two marriages or her own contribution.

"I just saw them as these horrible, abusive men and I wanted to go live in America so I could start my life afresh. All I did was relocate my pathology and myself to America, and there I met husband No. 3. After I married him, I started noticing the same syndrome, without the violence," she said.

Philippa Sklaar

"It was after that marriage that I finally had to look at myself enough to see what it was about me – it wasn't a coincidence that I just happened to choose all these men."

Sklaar's therapist Sue Hickey, who practised for more than 30 years, asked her to co-write When Loving Him Hurts, to share her experience as a woman who contributed to the "dance of abuse" and learned to overcome her self-destructive pathology. "Until we understand what that is, we'll continue repeating the pattern. My story is proof of that," Sklaar said.

She said that until she was able to understand why she felt she needed to be loved and validated by a damaged man, she would continue to jump from one abusive relationship to another.

"How do you explain to someone why you want to hug a shark? That the hands that beat me, I wanted them to comfort me? How do I explain to myself that the man who hit me, kicked me, punched me, pulled out my hair, spat in my face, that I wanted him to love me? I mean, it's insane."

Although she acknowledges that some people may confuse her message – that a woman must acknowledge her role in an abusive relationship – as a kind of blame-the-victim mentality, she said, although women are "never, ever to blame for the abuse," they are part of the solution.

"As soon as I took responsibility for what my contribution was, I can't begin to tell you how empowering that was. I was no longer at the mercy of anybody," Sklaar said, adding that the book outlines five skills and strategies that women can do to work on a solution.

Since her third marriage ended seven years ago, Sklaar said she is content being on her own. "Now I value my time alone and I love who I am now," she said. "My worthiness isn't dependent on anyone else's opinion of me. That took a long time." ■

Supporting older kids in foster care has its own rewards

sshefa@thecjn.ca

People making the decision to grow their families by adopting a child may be surprised to learn that the adoption landscape is not what it once was

The odds of being able to adopt a healthy newborn, or even a child under the age of two years old, are becoming slimmer and slimmer thanks to better access to birth control, abortion and the lack of stigma increasingly associated with single women raising children.

That said, there are countless children and teenagers in foster care throughout the country and abroad who are looking for stable homes and forever families, as well as young adults who are in need of a support system.

Aviva Zukerman Schure, who has volunteered for the Adoption Council of Ontario and Adopt4Life since she adopted her now 20-year-old daughter about two years ago, said that perhaps what holds most people back from considering adopting an older child is the misconception that children in foster care are "juvenile delinquents with no hope."

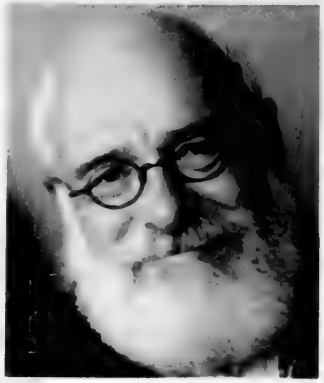
"I think there is a stigma that all the kids in foster care are such screw-ups that you can't even imagine," said Schure, who is also mother to four biological sons, all of whom are younger than her adopted daughter.

She said while speaking to adoption workers about wanting to find a child who was on a positive trajectory, wanted to do well in school and wanted to be part of a supportive family, she was told, "the system is filled with children like that."

Schure recalled meeting a young girl in foster care through Jewish Family & Child, an accredited children's aid society in Ontario that provides child protection services for Jewish families in the Greater Toronto Area.

"She was graduating from high school with super great marks and off to university and all this great stuff. These are awesome kids – not to say they don't have their issues like every single kid, but they just need to have that permanent supportive family there who is going to say, even when things get tough… that you're there for them," Schure said.

"I have friends with biological kids who have mental illness, who are addicted to drugs, who are involved in criminal activity. I have a child with ADHD, and it was not the one who was adopted."



Michael Grand

Schure eventually adopted her daughter based on a lead from the Adoption Council of Ontario.

When they met, her daughter, who is Korean, had been living in Canada for a year with a foster mother, and there was a language barrier.

"But she bonded with my kids over their mutual love of candy… and there was just that moment where she looked at me and I looked at her and I knew that she was the one who was meant to be our daughter."

About 10 months later, after the girl had spent weekends with the family and they got to know each other, the adoption was finalized.

Schure said that moving forward, she'd love to adopt 21-year-olds who have aged out of the system and are struggling on their own.

"It might not mean that they move into a room in your house, but that they have a permanent, ongoing, lifelong connection to at least one grown-up, because that makes the difference in their lives," Schure said.

Noelle Burke, an adoption permanency worker with JF&CS, said although JF&CS does act as a public adoption service, the first priority is to keep children with their original families.

"We put a lot of work and resources into keeping little ones with their original families, and when that's not possible,

When Helen Mlotek broke her hip last year, her children chose Kensington Place because they felt it had the best medical attention. Helen is happy: she'd rather get help when she needs it than hire a full-time caregiver. "I like my independence," she says. Now that she doesn't have to worry about shopping, cooking, cleaning or laundry, Helen has more time to play Gin Rummy, take exercise classes or participate in crafts.

"I enjoy the nice people and the activities," says Helen. "I like having something to do."

we go through a process of family finding, which is, if it looks like that young baby is going to come into our care, instead of placing them with a foster family right away and moving toward adoption, we put a lot of effort in looking at extended family who know the child because we want to strengthen family and keep them close," she explained.

"We go through that, and if that is not successful, only then will we really look at a non-relative adoption. There are a lot of processes that we go through to keep the child with their people, rather than placing them with non-relatives."

JF&CS currently has close to 40 children in care.

"Within that 40 we have about 10 kids in a legal position to be adopted. The majority are older teens," Burke said, adding that they serve children from birth to 18, but the average age of a child in need of adoption now at JF&CS is about 16.

Michael Grand, a University of Guelph professor emeritus who co-directed the National Adoption Study of Canada in 1993 and wrote a book called The Adoption Constellation: New Ways of Thinking About and Practicing Adoption, said the big push for agencies like JF&CS is to find homes or foster care for "hard to place" children.

"These are kids who have been in care for an extended period of time, kids with physical or emotional handicaps, kids who are older and sibling groups," he said.

Grand said in addition to addressing some of the issues that come with adopting an older child, there are certain efforts that need to be made to ensure lifelong connections are made.

First, he believes that for older children, one of the components in helping the adoptive child feel like a member of the family is to offer them the opportunity to give informed consent and a choice about whether they want to join a specific family.

"It is important that children move into a home where they themselves are part of the decision-making process, and that this is something they want," he said.

"Someone might say, 'I know better. This is good for you whether you like it or not.' We don't always respect the consent rights of the children as well as we could."

Schure said she understands the need for a child to be heard and acknowledged, but sometimes a child might need some convincing.

"With a lot of young people, if you ask them if they want to be adopted, all their experiences with family have been negative. And so when you say, 'Oh, do you want a new family?' They'll say no. Because why would they? So we need to stop saying, 'Well, we asked them and they didn't want to be adopted,' because that's not fair to them. The outcomes for kids who age out of the system without a permanent family... are much poorer."

Grand said one of the keys to facilitating a successful adoption in which the family and adopted child build trust and bond is being completely open about the child's adoption.

"It's not just an issue of an exchange of information. I've had many an adoptee tell me, 'Oh yes, they told me once and then we were never allowed to talk about it again.' Or, 'It was told to me in anger,' or, 'It was thrown in my face when I was acting up,'" he said.

He said in many ways, it is a lifelong conversation that families should have without it becoming a source of anxiety or hostility. And the conversation itself needs to evolve over time.

"For the adoptee, the historical fact of being taken from one family and being placed in another always raises the question, 'Did I matter enough to anyone to be kept in my family of origin?' And that is a prevailing question that haunts many adoptees even in the best adoptions because it's a fact you can't get around," Grand said.

"What you tell an eight-year-old is not what a 16-year-old needs to know... and it is not the same as what a 25-year-old needs."

Grand said that overall there is an expectation that openness is the norm, but it is not always practised and this can be the difference between a successful adoption and an unsuccessful one.

"People talk a good talk, but they don't always walk a good walk." ■

Leo Baeck NBA all star event kicks off interfaith efforts

JACK BORENSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Amid the glitz and hoopla of NBA all star weekend in Toronto, an event involving Leo Baeck Day School and local Christian and Muslim grade schools was about more than basketball.

Leo Baeck, Holy Rosary Catholic School and Islamic Foundation School took part Feb. 14 in "Building Bridges Through Basketball," which was meant as a prelude to more formal interfaith educational programs involving the three schools later this year.

Eric Petersiel has been involved with Leo Baeck's interfaith school program since becoming head of school in 2000.

"We arrange mock seder table settings as our students explain elements of the seder and what Passover is all about," he said. "There's a core desire of everyone attending a Jewish day school to learn not only about their own culture and environment, but also to be aware of and understand the world around them. We live in a global economy and environment, and our students need to understand what students of interfaith schools are experiencing in their lives."

Petersiel said Leo Baeck contacted Kathy Behrens, the NBA's president of social responsibility and player programs about getting involved in all-star weekend as part of the league's Jr. NBA program.

"Last year during our mock seder program, an informal basketball game occurred in our school gym involving interfaith students. When the opportunity came from Jr. NBA, the three schools were eager to participate."

Students from the three schools were greeted by Chiney Ogwumike of the WNBA's Connecticut Sun and Donnie Arey, an assistant coach at Warner University who teaches skills at basketball camps in more than 20 countries.

"I've used basketball clinics to help communities in conflict work together in friendship and promote team building," Arey said. "During a 10-day 2010 trip to Israel, I held basketball camps with coaches in Ramallah and Bethlehem, and we had a basketball game between Israeli and Palestinian kids from both areas."

Ogwumike sees basketball "as a universal language that can be appreciated by people of different cultures. As a team, we treat everyone as family, and the sport brings out the best in people."

In his introductory remarks, Arey told the kids the session was not only about basketball, "but also making you better people so you, your parents and your teachers learn to grow and develop happily together."

Chiney Ogwumike of the WNBA's Connecticut Sun and coach Donnie Arey give a skills clinic.

Boys and girls competed on different courts in a variety of agility exercises and basketball skills sessions taught in the one-hour clinic by Ogwumike, Arey and Muzala Yamfwa, a 2016 NBA All-Star Jr. NBA clinician and a clubs and competition assistant with Ontario Basketball.

Islamic Foundation School teacher Fazila Macci, said her Grade 8 students "were excited... and open-minded to meet new people on different levels, through sports. I feel today's basketball event will help when the interfaith sessions begin. Our students will proudly teach Leo Baeck and Holy Rosary students meanings of aspects of Muslim culture, such as Eid and Ramadan holidays, and wearing the hijab."

Leo Baeck Grade 7 student Aaron Davis was a key sponsor of his school's participation in the event, donating a significant portion of his bar mitzvah gift money. "I wanted to give something back to Leo Baeck so our students could enjoy this unique basketball experience, and meet students from the other schools."

Richard Davis said he was very proud of his son, "who stepped up in leadership with his generous donation. Aaron's sponsorship was based on using sports for good things, beside sports. Our family strongly support this interfaith initiative, which shows how different cultures share many similarities."

Leo Baeck south campus vice-principal Seth Goldsweig said the skills session highlights included "learning the game of basketball, or learning new skills to develop their game, as well as enjoying meeting a WNBA player, seeing former NBA players [including four-time champion Horace Grant] and current NBA players [including NBA rookie star Minnesota Timberwolves Karl-Anthony Towns], and meeting people from the other schools."

He acknowledged there wasn't much time for students from the three schools to get to know one another at the event, "but seeing a familiar face in future makes all the difference. Many of the students had this common experience, so when they see each other at the upcoming interfaith meetings they can start by saying 'Hey, remember when we played basketball together and...' Our students are looking forward to getting to know their Holy Rosary and Islamic Foundation school peers at future interfaith events." ■

Media adds to trauma of terror attacks, psychologist says

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

The media are responsible, at least in part, for exacerbating the trauma many Israelis and others suffer from exposure to terrorism and war, an expert on the emotional impact of terrorism says.

"The media's tendency to rebroadcast a terrorist attack over and over again along with reporting many false rumours worsens the trauma and sense of fear that many people feel in the aftermath of a terrorist attack," Solly Dreman, a professor emeritus in the department of psychology at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev told a Winnipeg audience at Temple Shalom on Feb. 9.

Speaking on the topic "Psychological Impact of War and Terrorism" along with two others – Edith Kimelman, a child Holocaust survivor, and Michelle Strain, a refugee response co-ordinator – Winnipeg-born Dreman, 77, cited for example the media's blanket coverage with raising the fear level higher than it needed to be.

"The media needs to cool it," he said. "While it is important to report the news and keep people informed, updates every four or five hours instead of continuous coverage would help calm the situation."

On behalf of the advocacy group Winnipeg Friends of Israel (one of the evening's sponsors along with Temple Shalom, the Jewish Post and News and the Winnipeg branch of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University), Yolanda Papini-Pollock added that Israelis, currently suffering through the "knife intifadah," have had more experience than most in dealing with war- and terror-related trauma.

Yolanda Papini-Pollock and Edith Kimelman

Israeli-born and raised, Papini-Pollock noted that Israelis do their best to live normal lives despite the fact that many have suffered some emotional damage through the experience of war or losing a loved one or friend to terrorist violence.

Dreman spoke about two families he counselled who were traumatized by terror. In both cases, two young children lost parents in a terrorist attack – a father in one and both parents in another. In the second attack, the children watched their parents die.

In both cases, Dreman noted, counselling seemed to help the children and the surviving mother to return to normal lives.

"Long term though, our counselling failed," he said. "Following up 10 years later, we found that the two children who were orphaned were involved in criminal activity (one was involved in a robbery at a museum) and drugs, while the boy in the other family became anorexic and was a compulsive worrier, and the girl had psychological difficulties brought on by having been called to serve in the army."

Although the widowed mother did remarry, he said, the marriage didn't last, in part because of the government's compensation rules. On remarrying, she lost her generous compensation benefits as the widow of a terror victim and her second husband was unable to financially support the family.

In dealing with trauma as a result of violence, Dreman emphasized the importance of having a social support network, maintaining a normal routine (especially for children), trying not to over-protect children and having parents encourage their children to express their fears, suggestions that the other two speakers agreed with.

Kimelman spoke of her lifelong nightmares and anxiety from her experiences during the Holocaust and her fears for the safety of her own three sons. After coming to Winnipeg at the age of 14 with other surviving family members, however, she said, she was able to complete her education and enjoy a successful career as a teacher and principal in the Jewish school system in Winnipeg.

Strain, a Manitoba Immigrant and Refugee Settlement Sector Association refugee response co-ordinator with the Salvation Army, talked about Manitoba's resettlement efforts on behalf of Syrian refugees.

"Manitoba has pledged to welcome about 2,000 Syrian refugees," she said. "The refugees that are coming here are among the most vulnerable. They are large families from poor areas of Syria. They have had limited education. The children received no schooling in the refugee camps. Housing in particular is a major problem."

But Manitoba has had a lot of experience integrating refugees from war-torn countries, she said. "The key to successful integration is a helping hand, helping the refugees to learn English, find work and become part of a community."

She cited the example of one young woman who was separated from her family during an attack on her village in Africa. She spent several years living in the jungle and came to Winnipeg with no English, limited education and two small children.

"At first, she rarely left her home," Strain said. "We got her into a program and she blossomed. She got a job, became a manager where she works and became a homeowner. She has built a wonderful life for herself and her children.

"That resiliency is common to most of the refugees that I have worked with." ■

Pioneer was Canada's first female provincial chief justice

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

Halifax, the province of Nova Scotia and Canada have lost a trailblazing woman who set precedents in the civic and justice communities.

Constance Glube, the first female provincial chief justice in Canada as well as the first Jewish woman to hold that job, died in Halifax Feb. 15 at 84. Glube was a woman who gave much of herself to the legal profession and the many community organizations who benefited from her extensive wisdom and expertise.

The Ottawa-born Glube was the first female city manager in Canada when she was named to the post in Halifax in 1974. Three years later, the graduate of McGill University (BA 1952) and Dalhousie Law School (LLB 1955) was named the first female judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia by then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau. In 1982, she was named the province's chief justice, the first woman in Canada to hold a provincial chief justice position.

In 1998, she became Chief Justice of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal, where she served until her retirement in December 2004.

"We'll miss her dearly," Nova Scotia Chief Justice Michael MacDonald told the Halifax Chronicle Herald. MacDonald appeared before Glube, known to friends as Connie, as a young Sydney lawyer. He called her "a great Canadian."

"There is no question Connie will have a place in history," former Nova Scotia premier John Buchanan said. He was a law school classmate of Glube, and premier when Glube was named chief justice of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court.

He said Glube's career saw her preside over many important legal cases in Nova Scotia history, including the Westray Mine inquiry.

Buchanan said he saw Glube only two weeks ago during a Canadian Bar Association event. The organization recognized Glube by awarding her the Constance R. Glube CBA Spirit Award, given to those who demonstrate "outstanding effort and contribution to women in law." Glube attended as the special guest.

Buchanan praised Glube as a great lawyer, excellent city solicitor and superb judge who knew many people and treated everyone with grace and respect.

"Constance Glube's contributions to the law and to our province are profound," said Nova Scotia Premier Stephen McNeil. "She maintained a lifelong commitment to gender, ethnic and religious equality and opportunity."

An obituary on the Courts of Nova Scotia website said Glube, as a Jewish woman in Canada in the mid-1900s, showed "steadfast dedication to overcoming the gender, ethnic and religious barriers of her era."

Glube and her late husband Richard were lifelong members of Shaar Shalom Synagogue, of which Richard's father, Joe, was a founding member. Glube served the synagogue in many capacities, and she was also a member of Hadassah WIZO and the local Masada Club for Jewish seniors, as well as a board member of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, Atlantic region, and the Canadian Museum for Human Rights.

A Queen's Counsel and member of the Order of Canada (2005) and Order of Nova Scotia (2006), Glube served the Queen Elizabeth II Hospital Foundation as a member, vice-chair and finally chair from 2007 to 2009. She was honorary chair of the Nova Scotia Barristers Society and an honorary member of both the Canadian Bar Association and International Association of Women Judges. She received honorary degrees from Dalhousie University, Mount St. Vincent University and Saint Mary's University.

Always a woman of integrity, dignity and generosity, Glube was never one to ruffle feathers, except in situations when she knew she was right, of course. Her constant smile made people feel welcome in her presence. You were the focus of her attention and were met with eye contact in any conversation. As a judge, she was known for complete impartiality and she led her private life the same way, remaining unaffiliated with external organizations to retain that judicial independence.

As a judge, she was focused on finding what was right and just. Her sense of fairness carried into her private life, where she treated everyone as an equal.

After she retired in 2004, Glube developed a passion for bridge, calling it "my second career." She became a Ruby Life Master, and days before her passing, she was eagerly anticipating a bridge cruise in late February.

Her children reflected on her generosity. "She gave back to so many causes because she felt she was so blessed in her life," said son Harry.

Her eclectic interests included gardening, swimming, Symphony Nova Scotia, Neptune Theatre and other arts endeavours.

Glube is survived by her sister Sheila Pollock of Ottawa; sons John (Toronto), Harry (Wanda Pottle, Halifax), and Joe (Elizabeth, Oakville, Ont.); and daughter Erica Kolatch (Barry, Silver Springs, Md.), five grandchildren and four great-grandchildren. ■

Goldbloom taught us to be proud, but never arrogant

In recorded interviews, notably with the oral historian Sharon Gubbay-Helfer, he discusses how difficult these responsibilities were and admitted that the Jewish community did not especially favour them. Yet he believed in them, dedicated himself to them and achieved a great deal.

Many Jews feared the conversion goals of the Christians involved in dialogue. Victor had a different understanding and approach. He read a great deal and understood the history of Christianity. He knew the history of the papacy and of the Catholic Church during the Holocaust. He was able to find fault where it lay, but to also see the effects of Christian aid and attempts to hide and help Jews during the Shoah. He was willing to build on that.

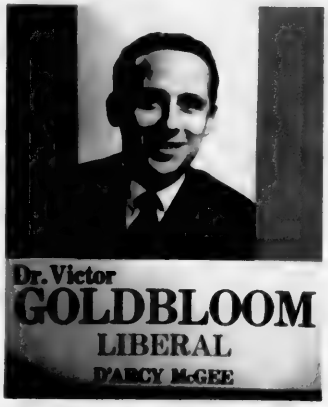
But primarily, he did not feel his Judaism was vulnerable to conversion. He was confident in his own Jewish identity and that of his colleagues. In fact, he felt that the more they would have to stand up and explain Jewish practices or define Jewish experiences, the stronger their voices would become and the stronger their identities would grow. He felt that the more you talked about Judaism to a non-Jew, the more comfortable and eloquent you became. On this basis alone, he was more than willing to engage in dialogue.

But, of course, he had more compelling reasons. Fear did not dissuade him. Insecurity was not familiar to him. He was confident as a Jew, but his overriding goal was to bring Jews and Christians to a mutual understanding. He noted that in the beginning, there was tension, and deep theological issues were divisive. But eventually, they were able to move away from those, which in itself was a great achievement. His dialogue discussions and meetings were able to focus on the social justice and action issues to improve our shared world. This was truly a great achievement, and a benefit to all.

Victor always looked to understand the context of any issue. He sought the consequence of events for both the individual and the community. Rather than being pedantic or overbearing, in his own way, he gently educated and shared information with colleagues by sending them clippings and articles. Cardinal Jean-Claude Turcotte, from 1990 to 2012 the archbishop of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Montreal, once noted of Victor: "He only talks about what he knows."

Victor's legacy is directed at the critical matter of how to approach diverse communities. He taught that we must learn what inspires people who are not like ourselves and what hurts them. Those are his lessons and commandments to us. He taught the Christian world – those that would listen – the same things. He taught us all to be proud and confident, but not arrogant or haughty, and to be both gentle and strong. He also showed us that we can survive and prosper with French and with dialogue. What a wonderful heritage.

Consequently, when he passed away last week, we all lost. We lost a leader, an advocate, an activist, a mentor and, for the lucky amongst us, a friend. But, of course, his family lost much more. They have suffered the loss of a beloved husband, father and grandfather whose presence and dedication was fundamental to their lives and who imparted to them the central elements of their heritage.



Victor Goldbloom was the first Jewish cabinet minister in Quebec.

Victor was blessed with Sheila, his wife of 67 years. They were a delightful and significant Montreal couple, adding to the dynamism of this community's legacy. Each in their own way contributed much to the culture and ethos of Montreal, but together they formed a strong presence that should be celebrated. They formed a vibrant family with three children, Susan, Michael, and Jonathan. The chain of life that began on July 31, 1923, with Victor's birth is alive and well, renewed in his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and even in the work that Victor cherished and laboured over.

While active and eager to continue his work, Victor was very modest about his many very significant awards. In an interview with Gubbay-Helfer after being personally made a Knight of the Order of St. Sylvester in 2012 by Pope Benedict XVI, Victor said that one must think, why him? After all, his awards were often not the usual ones, but were singular, public and distinctive.

> We lost a leader, an advocate, an activist, a mentor and, for the lucky amongst us, a friend

His answer was very instructive. He said the answer is for others to give. But most importantly, we must recognize that each of us tries to make the world a better place than when we came into it. He then noted that we must acknowledge we are all limited, but we are all able to do something. When it comes to interfaith dialogue, for example, small groups might have only limited, even minor, effect. Thus, one might feel insignificant.

But Victor felt that if each individual could feel the responsibility to dialogue, to reach out to others and improve the world, then as all those small steps would accumulate, and we could accomplish a lot.

That was his vision. That was what prompted his constant good work. And that is his legacy. We have indeed lost much. ■

He also served as minister of municipal affairs and oversaw the completion of the facilities for the 1976 Olympics in Montreal.

He resigned from the National Assembly in 1979 to become president of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. Goldbloom was one of the first Jewish leaders to reach out to the Catholic Church in Quebec in the 1950s, and his belief in the value of frank dialogue between people of different faiths, languages and cultures never wavered over his long life.

The memoir he published last year was aptly titled Building Bridges/Les Ponts du Dialogue. His fluency in English and French enabled him to write them both, without a translator.

His interest in inter-religious understanding extended to the national and international levels.

In honour of his life's work, Pope Benedict XVI made him a Knight of the Order of St. Sylvester in 2012, a rare honour for a Jew, or any non-Catholic.

The ceremony's venue was also unusual – a Jewish congregation, Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom – and the guest of honour was Goldbloom's longtime friend and colleague, Jean-Claude Cardinal Turcotte. At Goldbloom's initiative, Cardinal Turcotte had years earlier spoken from the temple's pulpit.

From 1987 to '90, Goldbloom was president of Quebec's Bureau d'audiences publiques sur l'environnement.

He also served as Canada's commissioner of official languages from 1991 to '99.

Within the Jewish community, he was notably chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, and for many years headed the committee of Jewish public health and social services institutions.

"In addition to his innumerable communal accomplishments, Dr. Goldbloom contributed in countless small ways to improving the lives of the individuals and families he touched, from the house calls he made to patients' families, like mine, in his early days as a pediatrician, to the thoughtful and gentle support that he provided to people of all ranks and backgrounds who sought his wise counsel. He will be deeply missed by all those who had the privilege of knowing him," said Federation CJA CEO Deborah Corber.

In "retirement" (a word he loathed), Goldbloom, well into his 80s, became a one-man road show, visiting towns all over the province trying to demystify what it means to be Jewish. During the corrosive debate over the secular values charter a few years ago, he made videos that were posted on social media, appealing to Quebecers' better natures and tolerance of minorities.

McGill principal and vice-chancellor Suzanne Fortier said Goldbloom "made many important contributions to our society, as a community leader, as a political figure and a public servant. He worked tirelessly to build bridges between religious groups and between language groups, helping foster greater understanding and tolerance."

Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre said Goldbloom was, "above all, a unifying force, an extremely talented politician and a great expert on compromise." He called him a "true-blooded Montrealer for whom our city's diversity was a great asset... He will remain an exemplary model for anyone who wants to go into politics."

David Birnbaum, the current MNA for D'Arcy McGee, said Goldbloom "greatly inspired me in the way I perceive politics. He was a mentor to me and will always be an example to follow."

In 1992, McGill bestowed an honorary degree on Goldbloom in recognition of his many years of service.

Among his many other citations, Goldbloom was appointed a Companion of the Order of Canada and an Officer of the Ordre national du Québec.

At the launch of his memoir at Montreal city hall, Goldbloom reflected on his extraordinary life.

"The things I have been part of, never in their wildest dreams would my [four Russian immigrant] grandparents have thought imaginable for their grandson, that I would have the privilege to do what I have been able to do."

Goldbloom is survived by his wife of 67 years, retired McGill University social work professor Sheila, and their children, Susan (Peter Restler), Michael (Fiona Macleod) and Jonathan (Alice Switocz), four grandchildren, two great-grandchildren and his brother, Dr. Richard Goldbloom. ■

Netanyahu, Herzog differ on Mideast peace prospects

JTA
TEL AVIV

Benjamin Netanyahu

Isaac Herzog

Speaking to a delegation of American Jewish leaders, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Knesset opposition leader Isaac Herzog struck divergent tones on the future of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Netanyahu suggested that a resolution to the conflict may come only after improved relations between Israel and its Arab neighbours, while Herzog reviewed his newly conceived plan for laying the groundwork of a future peace.

The two leaders spoke to a delegation from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which was in Israel last week for a five-day mission. The delegation met with a range of Israeli leaders, including President Reuven Rivlin, Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon and Education Minister Naftali Bennett.

Before arriving in Israel, the group also met with Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi.

In a brief reference to the Palestinians within a larger speech on Israel's international relations, Netanyahu said Israel shares interests with Arab states that could create stronger ties between Israel and its neighbours. Those ties, he said, could influence the prospects for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations and regional stability.

"I think the better relations with the Arab world could help bring progress with the Palestinians," Netanyahu said in his Feb. 14 speech. "I think that is very clear given the, what I regret to say is, the dysfunctionality that I often see in Palestinian politics, and I think that the encouragement of Arab states, leading Arab states, for a more realistic position on the part of the Palestinian Authority might contribute to a stabilizing situation and even advancing to a better future."

Speaking to the delegation Feb. 16, Herzog called for Israeli steps to improve prospects for a future two-state solution between Israelis and Palestinians. His plan, which he first released last month, calls for Israel to complete its security barrier around the West Bank – including through eastern Jerusalem – transfer civilian control in West Bank Palestinian areas to the P.A., and initiate a regional conference to address shared concerns. Herzog also called for a freeze on West Bank settlement expansion outside the major Israeli settlement blocs.

"Under the current leadership of both sides, there is no way we can progress even one iota," Herzog said, according to a Presidents Conference news release. "In a way, the borders have already been drawn."

In his address to the delegates on Feb. 18, the last day of their mission, Rivlin said the relationship between Israel and the United States should remain "beyond debate" during the U.S. election season.

"Many of you have different political views, support different candidates, and possibly vote for different political parties. But whichever party or candidate you support, there are important issues on which everyone must agree," Rivlin said. "Support for Israel in the United States has never been, and must not become, a party political issue.

"During the election season, it is my deep hope that the close relationship between Israel and the United States remains beyond debate. American friends of Israel should be able to feel free to express their democratic right and vote as they want, and know that whatever happens, the bonds between Israel and the U.S. are strong."

Rivlin also called for unity in the fight against the rising threat of anti-Semitism.

"Across the world we are seeing a rise in this old, and new disease, and there is more and more pressure to boycott the world's only Jewish state. We must stand firm against these threats; Israel is your partner in this fight," he said. ■

Homemade guns add to Israeli security woes

ROBERT SWIFT
THE MEDIA LINE, JERUSALEM

The gun that killed Hadar Cohen wasn't carried into the Palestinian territories through tunnels or smuggled past guards at a checkpoint. It was an improvised firearm, probably homemade in a basement or kitchen somewhere in the West Bank.

The 19-year-old rookie Border Police officer was killed and her colleague wounded in a combined stabbing and shooting attack at Jerusalem's Damascus Gate at the beginning of the month. The three attackers, Palestinians in their early 20s from northern communities in the West Bank, had been approached and questioned because they were acting suspiciously, prompting their deadly reply.

Neither of the guns used in the attack – described as Carl Gustav submachine guns – were the ubiquitous Kalashnikov assault rifles favoured by the likes of Hamas and Hezbollah.

"We're not talking about military grade, manufactured weapons. These are weapons that are being produced in homemade factories," Israeli police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld told The Media Line.

Whether the guns were improvised or not, Cohen's death demonstrates that such tools' lethality cannot be underestimated. "These firearms are reaching the level of military-made weapons. They fired like an AK47 or M-16," Rosenfeld said.

Photographs of the two firearms seized in the incident appear to show they were both customized from the original bodies of conventional weapons – one a Kalashnikov AK47 and the other the American standard, the M-16. Both weapons fired 5.56 ammunition, Rosenfeld said.

Two weeks later, the scene almost repeated itself, underscoring the growing use of the improvised weapon.

Shortly before midnight on a Sunday evening, police on patrol, again near the Old City of Jerusalem's Damascus Gate, ordered a man said to be acting suspiciously to stop. The suspect responded by drawing a weapon and was shot dead by the officers. A nearby attacker then opened fire on police and was also killed, but only after firing scores of rounds at police with his weapons – an improvised M-16 variant and a second homemade gun – on "automatic."

Occurring late in the evening after traffic had died down, the gunfire was heard across central Jerusalem.

Availability, cost may lead groups to make own weapons

Weapons of this nature have a long history of use in conflicts involving non-state actors, Nick De Arrinaga, European editor at IHS Jane's Defence weekly magazine, told The Media Line. Resistance fighters in France and Poland during World War II; the underground organizations Haganah and Etzel during Israel's War of Independence; and more recently, Chechens seeking to push out the Russian Army all used improvised weapons, he said.

"There's a huge breadth of quality when it comes to improvised weapons: Some are very basic, not reliable and potentially dangerous to the user," De Arrinaga said, noting that at the other end of the spectrum are, "essentially underground factories producing standardized weapons."

Cohen's killers came into Israel illegally from the West Bank, so it's likely that their weapons were produced there, rather than inside the 1967 borders, and provided to the assailants prior to the attack. The Israeli army, responsible for security in the West Bank, declined to comment on issues relating to the infrastructure used to manufacture and distribute this sort of weapon.

"It's fairly complicated and it takes time. But the fact is if it's made by a close circle [of people], the time that it takes them is maybe a couple of days or weeks," Rosenfeld said. Ammunition is not hard to come by in the West Bank, he said, suggesting that rounds in the possession of the Palestinian security forces can easily fall into the hands of those seeking to shoot Israelis.

Which raises the question, "Why is anybody making improvised firearms when conventional weapons seem to be relatively easy to get in the West Bank?"

Availability and cost are the first two reasons that a group might choose to make its own weapons, De Arrinaga said. If it's difficult to procure weapons or the cost of doing so is prohibitively high, then an organization might choose to build their own. A third reason, De Arrinaga suggested, is to remain unnoticed by security forces.

Homemade guns do not have serial numbers, which can be traced. In addition, if they were to be made by a small group of people capable of keeping a secret, they could stay beneath the radar and surprise Israel's security forces.

The fact that improvised weapons are still being made despite the abundance of guns in the West Bank also shows that the individuals using such weapons are not connected to the mainline terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Brig.-Gen. Nitzan Nuriel, former head of counter-terrorism with the Israeli government, told The Media Line.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visits wounded Border Police officer Ravit Mirilashvilli, whose partner, officer Hadar Cohen was killed in an attack earlier this month. AMOS BEN GERSHOM/GPO PHOTO

The individuals making these weapons "are not connected to any terror groups and want to keep a low profile," Nuriel said. If a person were to decide they want to conduct an attack against Israelis, they might inadvertently tip off security forces if they began by attempting to purchase a weapon. Constructing one at home avoids this problem, according to Nuriel, who warned that this is something that's only going to become easier as technology improves.

Instructions for making these weapons are readily available on the Internet and most of the items needed to produce them can be easily acquired, because they have dual purposes, like agricultural fertilizer used to make explosives, Nuriel explained.

Further complicating these factors is the emergence of new technology in the form of 3-D printers, which allow production of solid plastic objects using a computer file and a specialized printer, and are being developed for firearms production in the United States.

According to Nuriel, 3-D technology has not yet been seen among Palestinian organizations, but it's something they are interested in.

"I'm from the group that believes it is only a matter of time until we see more and more improvised explosives and weapons attacks," Nuriel said. ■

Rabbinate's control of mikvahs raises privacy concerns

AMANDA BORSCHEL DAN
JERUSALEM

A religious married woman stands, unclothed, in front of a ritual bath attendant and is inspected for errant strands of hair, earrings or nail polish.

In every other forum, she dresses modestly – often from head to toe– yet at the ritual bath, which religiously observant women must visit monthly, seven days after ending menstruation, she's questioned on matters of excruciating intimacy.

Several Supreme Court cases, both active and resolved, and even a set of 10 protocols released in 2014 by the Ministry of Religious Affairs, have fought for a woman's right to privacy at the mivkah. But a new law proposed by United Torah Judaism MK Moshe Gafni that would place the ritual baths under the authority of the Israeli Chief Rabbinate threatens to unravel these privacy protections.

Gafni began collecting signatures from fellow MKs for his proposed law after the Supreme Court ruled the Reform and Conservative movements in Israel can use the state ritual baths for their conversions.

The head of the Israeli Reform Movement Gilad Kariv told The Times of Israel that his movement performs some 500 conversions a year. Kariv added that many of the children adopted abroad, and presumably those born by surrogates abroad, are converted in Reform conversions. (Since a 2002 Supreme Court decision, those converted in Israel by the Reform and Conservative movement can register with the Interior Ministry as Jewish.)

In Israel, public ritual baths are run by local municipalities, all of which have religious life committees that in many cases include women. This month's Supreme Court ruling established that since the baths are publicly funded, they must be even-handed about who can use them.

For Gafni, moving oversight of mikvahs to the Chief Rabbinate is a twofold victory: In making them a religious matter – like marriage or divorce, which are legally unavailable to the Reform and Conservative movements – the Rabbinate could block their use by the liberal movements. As well, the switch would also alter the way the majority of the ritual baths' customers – modern Orthodox women – use them. By putting them under the Chief Rabbinate's control, they'd be forced to follow the institution's ultra-Orthodox approach.

According to the Eden Center, a mikvah education agency that trains bath attendants to be more compassionate, some 10,000 secular women have their first, and often only, experience with mikvahs before marriage. However, some 750,000 observant women, the overwhelming majority being modern Orthodox or religious Zionist, make regular use of them.

New rules could affect modern Orthodox women, critics warn.

It's therefore counterintuitive to see signatories on Gafni's bill from Education and Diaspora Minister Naftali Bennett's Jewish Home party, whose constituents are largely modern Orthodox.

In 2014, while minister of religious affairs, Bennett's deputy minister Ben Dahan released a 10-point set of protocols for privacy in mikvahs. Among them was the right of women to decline help from attendants. "If the woman who is preparing to immerse in the ritual bath is not interested in receiving the services of the bath attendant, including inspection, the attendant must not delay her immersion and shall not ask her any questions... One must emphasize the need for total privacy in the ritual bath, and thus the attendant must not ask questions that may infract on the woman's privacy," read the protocols.

In a letter to several Jewish Home MKs ahead of a party meeting Monday, Rabbi Seth Farber, head of Itim, asked the signatories to rethink their support. Itim, an NGO that helps Israelis, including new immigrants, navigate Israel's religious bureaucracy, is also involved in a Supreme Court case on behalf of 13 women seeking privacy in the ritual bath.

Putting mikvahs under the Chief Rabbinate's control, Rabbi Farber said, essentially creates a new monopoly for the rabbinate and "emasculates women from any authority in the mikvah." With Jewish Home support, he said, "they're disenfranchising not just the Reform and Conservative movements, but the 'bread and butter' of their community – the religious Zionists." ■

Jerusalem square to be renamed for teen stabbed at pride parade

JTA
JERUSALEM

Zion Square in downtown Jerusalem will be renamed for the teenage girl who was stabbed to death last summer at the city's gay pride parade.

The area will be called Tolerance Square in memory of Shira Banki, 16, who was killed in July by a haredi assailant who had just been released from prison for committing a similar attack at the 2005 gay pride march. Five others were injured in the 2015 attack.

Banki, a high school student from Jerusalem, was marching to support her gay friends. Her parents donated her organs.

The Jerusalem municipality has also announced a competition to redesign the site, which is being renovated.

"Zion Square, in the historic heart of downtown Jerusalem – which for many years attracted protests, demonstrations and clashes – will soon become a square to represent tolerance and mutual respect in the spirit of the late Shira Banki, murdered during the Gay Pride Parade," the municipality said in a statement.

Third suspect nabbed in deadly supermarket stabbing

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF

Israeli security forces said Sunday they had arrested a third suspect in the stabbing attack at a West Bank supermarket that killed an Israeli man Feb. 18.

Omar Rimawi and Ihad Sabah, both 14, from Beitunia near Ramallah, were identified as the two attackers who stabbed Tuvia Yanai Weissman, 21, and another man at the Rami Levy supermarket in the Sha'ar Binyamin Industrial Zone, southeast of Ramallah.

They were shot by an armed civilian who rushed to the scene after hearing screaming. Sabah died of his wounds. Rimawi remains hospitalized.

Weissman, a dual Israeli-U.S. citizen and resident of the West Bank settlement of Ma'ale Michmas, was stabbed and critically injured while shopping with his wife, Yael, and four-month-old daughter, Neta. He later died of his wounds in the hospital.

A second victim, identified as a 35-year-old man, sustained moderate injuries, but has been released from the hospital.

Israeli police released photographs Feb. 18 from the supermarket showing blood splattered on the floor of an aisle stocked with laundry detergent.

Security footage from the attack showed that three Palestinians sought to enter the supermarket. A security guard turned one away, but allowed the other two in without a physical check. The third suspect is believed to be the one seen being turned away. The suspect is identified by authorities only as a Ramallah resident.

The Feb. 18 attack was the second to occur in a Rami Levy supermarket in recent years. In 2014, two Israelis were moderately injured in an attack at a branch of the discount chain in Mishor Adumim, an industrial zone east of Jerusalem.

Since October, some 30 Israelis have been killed by Palestinians in knife, gun and car-ramming attacks. More than 160 Palestinians have been killed, some 115 of them while carrying out attacks, and others during clashes and demonstrations. ■

Spotlight shines on Israeli culture in Toronto

SHERI SHEFA
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Spotlight on Israeli Culture, a two-month showcase of Israeli music, theatre, film, dance and visual arts, is gearing up for its third year.

"We're just trying to once again focus and highlight and showcase some of the diverse and vibrant original culture that is coming out of Israel. Israel, as you may be aware, produces beyond proportional [numbers] of artists compared to other countries in the world, so maybe it is just a lifestyle, in that they put a lot into art and culture," said Janet Klugsberg, executive director of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF), the group that organizes the event.

Supported by the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto, the Spotlight is presented by a number of cultural organizations in Toronto – the Ashkenaz Festival, the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, The Rex Jazz and Blues Bar, the Toronto Jewish Film Society, the Toronto Public Library and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – to showcase Israeli art throughout the city from Feb. 21 to April 10.

Klugsberg said it's meaningful to her to be able to present Israeli artists whose careers have flourished, in small part as a result of financial support they received from CICF's Sharett Scholarship program in Israel, which provides tuition assistance to young, talented artists.

"Young artists, whether they are musicians, dancers, in film, in theatre, in art, compete for these prestigious scholarships. People like [conductors and violinists] Itzhak Perlman or Pinchas Zukerman received these when they were young," she said.

Some of the participants in this year's Spotlight, including musicians Roni Eytan, a harmonica player studying on a full scholarship at Berklee College of Music, and Avishai Cohen, a world-class trumpeter, are former Sharett Scholarship recipients. Both will be playing at The Rex on April 10.

"CICF is pleased to have supported some of these artists when they were young, and now we're featuring them in the Spotlight. To be part of their growth and to see how far they've come is really something amazing for me," Klugsberg said.

Some of the other performance highlights include A-WA, Israel's hottest new world music act consisting of three sisters – Tair, Liron and Tagel Haim – who combine their Yemeni musical roots with contemporary funk, electronica and hip-hop influences.

"They have the first Arabic song to hit the top of the charts in Israel, and they were also featured by Al-Jazeera, even though they are a Jewish-Israeli group," Klugsberg said.

A-WA will perform at the Mod Club on March 20.

Mikvah, an Israeli play that explores the secret world of the ritual bath as it relates to religious observance and "evolving feminist consciousness" and was named the 2004 Production of the Year at the Israeli Theatre Academy Award, will run at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on March 6.

The film The Kind Words (in Hebrew and French, with English subtitles), a story about three siblings who are confronted with a revelation about the identity of their "real" father, will be screened at the Empress Walk theatre on Feb. 28.

Idan Sharabi, a choreographer and dancer who will be at The Citadel on March 1, will be part of a triple bill performance that will include her award-winning dance duet Ours, which won best choreography in the Copenhagen International Choreography Competition and the Hanover Choreography Competition.

Klugsberg said Idan Sharabi, a Sharett scholarship recipient, has openly praised CICF and credited the support he received from the scholarship as helping to shape his career.

"Idan Sharabi is really one of the up-and-coming stars in the world of dance, so it is really nice to know that the support we gave these people when they were younger has helped in their growth, and now to see them be world class, whether they are musicians or dancers, is really something special for CICF and our donors to see the impact our support can have," she said.

"Culture is really something that transcends borders and we really want to make the Spotlight on Israeli culture something that people recognize this time of year and make it a fixture in Toronto's cultural scene... Hopefully in 2017, with Canada's 150th anniversary, and then in 2018 [with] Israel's 70th anniversary, we're hoping to increase the exposure and increase the connection between the countries and continue to make this a real splash." ■

Greater Expectations!

Setting a new Standard for Alzheimer's and Dementia Care

I remember that morning clearly. It was just after Purim and my then four year old daughter stood next to me facing the hallway mirror. She stayed silent while intensely studying the movements of my hands as I hurriedly and almost instinctively formed the knot and fastened my tie. As I proceeded to put on my suit jacket she quickly turned to me, the ringlets in her red hair following behind and with big blue eyes filled with wonder and curiosity, broke the silence with seven unforgettable words. "Daddy, are you wearing your work costume?"

I am fascinated by societal norms and expectations. Indeed, who determined that a suit and tie versus more casual wear was standard workplace business attire? My daughter saw no distinction between her Queen Esther outfit and my suit and tie and if you think about it, both are equally like playing dress-up.

Too often, what society 'expects' becomes what is considered the accepted norm. Unfortunately, this also applies to how we regard and treat the elderly. No longer can we be satisfied for retirement residences to be places to merely passively live out one's remaining years. Although strides have been made when it comes to how seniors living with Alzheimer's and dementia are cared for, we as a society need greater expectations.

Right from the beginning of my career, I have been determined to change the 'system'. I advocate to 'see' the person and recognize that who they are is distinct from the symptoms of their disease. Our seniors have a lifetime of experience upon which to draw from and share. As such, retirement residences should be places where 'life comes to people, and people come to life'. Places of love, life, laughter and vibrancy. Places of growth, learning and continuous development for those living, working and visiting within it. They should be places where the uniqueness, dignity and spirit of the human soul is fostered, honoured and respected. And most of all, be a place to live, not just a place to be.

Ottawa-born goalie gets NHL call-up

Daniel Altshuller GREGG FORWERCK PHOTO

At 21, Daniel Altshuller has registered some pretty impressive highlights in his still young hockey career. First, there was the time he was selected from the second-tier Nepean Raiders junior team to backstop a group of OHL skaters on Team Ontario at the World Under-17 Hockey Challenge. Altshuller shut the door on some high-level competition, led the team to a gold medal and was voted tournament all-star.

Then there was the time the Carolina Hurricanes selected him in the third round, 69th overall, of the 2012 NHL entry draft in Pittsburgh, marking the start of his pro career.

Pretty good memories, to be sure, but they were eclipsed recently when Altshuller got to live the dream – to actually suit up for a game in the NHL. In all, Altshuller spent four games with the Hurricanes, called up from the Charlotte Checkers of the American Hockey League (AHL) to serve as Eddie Lack's backup when starting goalie Cam Ward sat out with an injury. One of the games was in Toronto, just down the road from his hometown of Ottawa, so Altshuller had plenty of support as he made his NHL debut.

"A lot of my family came to watch," he said on the phone from Charlotte. "It was a great experience in that building. It was a sold-out arena. It was awesome."

What makes his NHL debut even more remarkable is that the six-foot-three, 205-pound netminder started the season playing for the Florida Everblades in the ECHL, two rungs below the NHL.

His career trajectory is clearly pretty steep. He spent last year – his first as a pro – with the Everblades, where he recorded an .881 save percentage and a 3.34 goals against average (GAA). Not exactly Carey Price numbers.

But something happened over the summer – all of it good. He worked hard on his game and focused on improving his skating. And with a year of pro hockey under his belt, he began to feel more confident in his abilities.

He started the season with the Everblades, in the Fort Myers area, and in 14 games, produced a 1.58 goals against average and a .941 save percentage. He led the ECHL in pretty much all important goalie statistics – wins, shutouts (3) and save percentage.

> It was a great experience in that building. It was a sold-out arena. It was awesome.

Called up by the Checkers, the Hurricane's AHL affiliate, he continued to turn heads while turning away pucks. In his first 11 games, he played a big part in the team's 9-1-1 record, boasting a 1.71 goals against average, a .941 save percentage, and one shutout.

He's cooled off a bit since then. After 13 games, he now sits with a won/loss record of 9-2-2, with a 2.17 GAA and a .929 save percentage.

Pretty good numbers for a rookie who is still feeling his way in the pro leagues. But as they say, goalies are voodoo – you never know just how they'll turn out.

Even he admits, "With young goalies, it takes time."

He feels he's continuing to make steady progress in his on-ice performance. And he doesn't seem all that intimidated by the competition.

The step up to the AHL, where he serves as the backup to veteran Drew MacIntyre, was manageable. "It's not really a big jump," he said. "It's just a little more organized and structured."

Management told him they were going to give him a chance, and "if I play well, it could be a more permanent situation," he recounted.

Like other elite prospects, Altshuller has enjoyed success at all levels of hockey. In his first year with the Oshawa Generals of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) he won the Dinty Moore Trophy for having the best rookie goals against average.

He was named to the OHL's first all-rookie team, and a year later, he was named top academic university or college player, receiving the Roger Neilson Memorial Award.

A student at Ottawa's Hillel Academy growing up, Altshuller was preparing to backstop Canada at the Maccabiah Games in 2013, but he had to withdraw so he could attend the Hurricane's development camp.

He still has plans to visit to Israel. He, along with his brother and a friend, have applied to the Birthright program, and if accepted, they expect to visit the Holy Land this summer.

In the meantime, he's got pucks to stop and games to win.

Asked to provide a scouting report on himself, Altshuller said he's developed his own unique style.

The website Hockey's Future describes him like this: "Altshuller has all the tools to be a dominant butterfly goalie: size, athleticism and a calm consistency. Since turning pro last year, he's been able to wrestle away significant ice time in net. He is capable of handling a big workload…

"His tools and athleticism suggest he can be an NHL goaltender one day. To reach that level he will need to gain game experience." ■

What we must rebuild before building a Jewish museum

Evelyn Tauben

With the Jewish Museum of Canada now on hold indefinitely, it is apparent that where a renovation is truly needed is in the systems of thinking and organizing in our community.

The laudable vision of philanthropists Isadore and Rosalie Sharp – to embed the museum in a larger cultural complex at University of Toronto together with part of the Jewish studies program, departments of History and Near and Middle Eastern civilizations, the Institute of Islamic Studies and a performance hall – will not be realized. While the museum is not entirely moribund, it will not be part of this visionary hub, but will join other discarded Canadian Jewish museum projects.

That such a significant partnership opportunity was left to fizzle suggests great indifference on the part of Canadian Jews toward our history and its place in the national narrative.

Leading museum professional Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett expressed her own disappointment to me. "There was an opportunity to create a first-class institution in an academic setting, next to Toronto's flagship museum, the Royal Ontario Museum. Not just another Jewish museum, but rather an innovative institution that could break new ground in drawing on the experience of one of Canada's many communities to reflect on a wide range of issues of increasing relevance in our world today."

"What went wrong?" She asked her online network. The answer lies in ineffective Jewish communal structures and the diffuse nature of Canadian Jewish identity.

Having visited Jewish museums around the world – in Amsterdam, Warsaw, Athens, Paris, Los Angeles, New York – I find it disappointing, embarrassing even, that a Jewish museum cannot gain traction here. The CJN report on the abandoned plans revealed that the fundraising effort, shepherded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, did not meet targets along the university's timeline.

Perhaps part of the reason why this initiative was not funded is that we don't have a clear sense of the story we have to tell – and worse still, don't believe strongly it is worth telling, to ourselves or to the wider public.

Many with influence and wealth, especially in the gravitational centre of the national community – Toronto – cultivate a Jewish identity reminiscent of the Enlightenment ideal: Jew at home, man on the street. Jewish philanthropists who are vital to bastions of culture such as the Art Gallery of Ontario, the ROM, the ballet, opera, symphony and so on, were evidently not equally inspired to foster a major institution of Jewish cultural import. What to make of this disparity? Does it reflect an innate insecurity or ambivalence about Jewish culture in the public sphere?

Even as a museum advocate, I find myself wondering: if resources are so sparingly distributed in our community to Jewish arts and culture, can we bear a cultural institution of the scope projected by the Sharps? Perhaps the focus must be instead on grassroots projects that are innately tied to community with more modest budgets such as the nomadic Museum of Jewish Montreal with its strong online presence and popular walking tours.

There is a further structural challenge in Canada, where leading Jewish philanthropists are tethered to the fossilized Jewish federation system, which, despite a respectable core mandate, never even pretends to place a premium on culture. Rather, volatile circumstances have repeatedly demonstrated that the federation with its conservative approaches and limited priorities makes for a strange bedfellow, if not a toxin, to cultural initiatives. Yet, it remains the system that donors trust.

The usual channels will not do for an undertaking as bold and big as a Jewish museum to succeed. We need new strategies, risk-takers, galvanizing leaders and experienced cultural professionals. We need to support the latter with real resources to build substantive, groundbreaking institutions. We need to cut loose from the federation system, letting it focus on what it does best rather than deputizing it as a catchall for every Jewish undertaking. We need to know our story as Canadian Jews and to value it as part of the great Canadian story. ■

Music series pays tribute to the composers of Golden Age of Hollywood

David Wall

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When the Great Depression dimmed the lights of Broadway, its predominantly Jewish songwriters packed their bags and headed to Hollywood which absorbed some 75 per cent of Broadway's talent after the stock market crash of 1929.

Out west, songwriters such as George Gershwin, Harold Arlen, Irving Berlin and Richard Rodgers penned the soundtracks of classic movies made during the "Golden Age of Hollywood," from the 1930s to the 1950s. In the 1960s, Jewish songwriters continued to make an impact in Hollywood. Burt Bacharach composed music for the hit movies What's New Pussycat and Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid.

Jazz.FM's Jewish Songwriters Series is presenting an evening of songs written by Jewish Americans that have helped define the sound of Hollywood on March 9.

Local singer David Wall, the radio station's director of community outreach and education since last September, is hosting the show.

"I guarantee there's going to be some songs from the Fred Astaire/Ginger Rogers movies, which were for some reason a fount of classic songs," Wall said, singling out Isn't This a Lovely Day (to Be Caught in the Rain) by Berlin and You Can't Take That Away From Me and A Foggy Day (in London Town) by Gershwin. Wall said he'll probably perform his rendition of Goldfinger, the theme song from the 1964 James Bond movie, with lyrics co-written by Anthony Newley.

"There's an endless possibility because there are so many Jewish composers who dabbled in film music," Wall said, adding that what's on the show's song list also depends on what the guest vocalists, Sophie Perlman and John Finley, decide to sing.

Wall called jazz and R&B singer Perlman one of the most accomplished singers in Canada. "She has an instantly recognizable voice and an absolutely winning personality," he said.

Finley is a former singer of the late-1960s rock group Rhinoceros. In the mid-1960s, he shared vocal duties in Jon and Lee and The Checkmates, a popular Toronto R&B band. Finley has "actually turned into one of the best jazz singers I've heard in my life," Wall said.

Jazz.FM's 2015/16 edition of the Jewish Songwriters Series winds down on April 6 with an evening devoted to protest songs written by Phil Ochs, Bob Dylan, Laura Nyro and Woody Guthrie and features vocalists Lorraine Segato, Dione Taylor and Wall. The show's song list includes Malvina Reynolds' Little Boxes and Abel Meeropol's Strange Fruit.

"We're going to approach them as if they're jazz standards," Wall said, adding that jazz musicians have historically taken songs that might not necessarily be called jazz songs and reinterpreted them.

This is the second year of Jazz.FM's Jewish Songwriters Series, the brainchild of the station's president and CEO Ross Porter. Porter approached Wall one night two years ago at a tribute to Bacharach with the idea for the series, after hearing Wall speak about how aspects of Bacharach's music and Hal David's lyrics seemed intrinsically Jewish.

As a curator of the series, Wall said, "It's not very difficult to find Jewish songwriters, especially in the history of jazz. Most of the jazz standards were written by Jewish composers. That's just a fact." ■

The Jewish Experience in Hollywood, at Hugh's Room on March 9, 8 p.m. features vocalists Sophie Perlman and John Finley and MC/vocalist David Wall, with saxophonist Alex Dean. We Insist! Jazz Songs of Protest, at Hugh's Room on April 6 at 8 p.m., features vocalists Lorraine Segato and Dione Taylor and MC/vocalist Wall, with saxophonist Richard Underhill. Pianist Mark Kieswetter, drummer Davide Direnzo and bassist Daniel Fortin play at both shows. For tickets go to jazz.fm. For dinner reservations at Hugh's Room call 416-531-6604.

I host Friday night dinners, they take care of the rest!

Play looks at patriarch suffering from dementia

DAVID SILVERBERG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We've seen the hashtag #realtalk used flippantly on social media, but one of the pioneers of modern Canadian theatre truly deserves that millennial moniker.

Director Joel Greenberg often takes an unflinching gutsy look at the human condition in his productions, which he's been doing for decades with his company Studio 180. But now he's partnering with Tarragon Theatre for the first time to probe another complicated and important facet of life – dealing with dementia.

You Will Remember Me was written in French by Quebec playwright François Archambault, and will have an English translation for this Toronto premiere. It will run at Tarragon Theatre from March 9 to April 10.

The play looks at an aging patriarch of a modern family who suffers from dementia, and how the people who love him struggle to understand his disease and care for his well-being.

Joel Greenberg

"There's a larger metaphor in the play about collective memory," says Greenberg in an interview. "What does one generation work hard to achieve, and how does the next one work hard to not ignore it?"

Greenberg goes on to say he was attracted to the play's larger theme about what a generation will be passionate about in a given moment, and how successive generations are expected to take on those same missions.

> You Will Remember has that human connection, of watching a family in crisis.

"You Will Remember has that human connection, of watching a family in crisis," adds Greenberg.

Bringing this production to Toronto echoes Studio 180's core goals: put on plays that deal with hard complex issues. "I don't think we've done any play that ties up neatly at the end," notes Greenberg.

Studio 180 has tackled homophobia (The Laramie Project), the Middle Eastern conflict (The Arab-Israeli Cookbook), the George W. Bush administration (Stuff Happens), black-white relations (Parade) and class war (Clybourne Park). If it's dense, dark but still offers flashes of humour, Studio 180 will be on top of it.

Greenberg, a native of Montreal who moved to Toronto in 1971, is keen on partnering with other theatre groups, he says, as he's done with Mirvish Productions and Canadian Stage. In this debut partnership with Tarragon Theatre, Greenberg says it's a good fit, because "this is a new writer to English Canada and Tarragon audiences are very appreciative of new work.

"Part of the excitement of a partnership is you get to have more ideas, when someone is looking at the same work in different ways." ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Myanmar: A nation in a state of transition

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, MYANMAR

The exterior and interior of Musmeah Yeshua Synagogue, the only shul in Myanmar RON CSILLAG PHOTOS

This country is in a constant state of flux. Though still widely called Burma, its official name has been Myanmar since the late 1980s. The capital was Rangoon, now called Yangon. A decade ago, with no warning or consultation, the government moved the capital 300 kilometres north to Naypyidaw, halfway to Mandalay.

Myanmar is emerging, gingerly, from decades of harsh military rule. Last November's elections resulted in a landslide win for Nobel Peace Prize winner Aung San Suu Kyi, who spent 15 years under house arrest by order of the junta. The whole nation, it seems, is holding its breath about the upcoming scheduled handover of power. If it fails, it's feared the generals will be back.

But an overall sense of optimism prevails and tourism is up thanks to a new openness.

The sole constant in this complex, gentle land is religion, a profound Buddhism. The skyline of Yangon is dominated by the sumptuous, gold-dome Shwedagon Pagoda, the most sacred Buddhist site in the country and always packed with worshippers who drop and pray pretty much anywhere along a tiled promenade of shrines and chapels.

Another stable institution can be found in Yangon's insanely cacophonous downtown neighbourhood of Pabedan, which is mainly Indian and Muslim. At number 85 on 26th Street, tucked between a paint store and an open-air shop bulging with rope and webbing, one finds the Musmeah Yeshua Synagogue, Myanmar's sole Jewish congregation.

Built by Baghdadi merchants who migrated here in the 19th century, later augmented by Cochin Jews from India who traded in teak, the small wooden structure burned down in 1854 and was re-opened in 1893 on this spot. After visiting over a dozen Buddhist monasteries, shrines and pagodas in various states of disrepair, it was a pleasure to walk into the spotless synagogue's sanctuary.

We were told that the caretaker, who was mopping the floor the day we visited, and the guard at the door, are Muslim.

The Jewish population in Rangoon peaked at 3,000 and Jews dealt in textiles and timber. The community was so well-regarded that Rangoon and the smaller city of Pathein had Jewish mayors.

But when Japan invaded and conquered Burma in 1942, things came to a halt. Regarded by the new wartime overlords as spies for the British, Jews fled to Australia and India. Any remnants left when the Burmese army took power in 1962.

At one point, there were 126 Torah scrolls stored in the shul. Today, there are two, encased in beautiful Iraqi-style filigreed silver capsules.

We are warmly greeted by a smiling Sammy Samuels, a 35-year-old business graduate of Yeshiva University in New York and community spokesman. Sammy took the helm from his famous father, Moses, who served as caretaker and trustee for decades before his death last year at age 65 (on display under glass are letters of condolences, including one from the government of Canada).

Samuels notes that the core community today consists of 20 people, all citizens of Myanmar, but that a wider Jewish group of visiting academics, diplomats, students and ex-pats may number up to 120.

There's a minyan Friday nights, depending on how many foreigners show up. Samuels says a rabbi visits from New York for High Holiday services.

The synagogue's airy two-level interior is marked by chandeliers, white pillars, a central bimah, lots of red velvet, and sturdy teak pews with woven rattan seats and backs. The whole affair is a colonial relic.

Prayer is still in the Sephardi style. Funds are raised mainly by donations. There's a Jewish cemetery holding 700 graves on 91st Street but we didn't make it there.

Interfaith relations are good, Samuels reports, with Christian schoolchildren visiting regularly. He lowers his voice when he tells me that there's growing tensions between Buddhists and Muslims. "This is something the government will have to face," he adds.

Burma and Israel achieved independence the same year, 1948. Blown-up photos in the sanctuary show a 1961 state visit here by founding Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion wearing full Burmese dress, and by former foreign minister Abba Eban in 1967. Burmese leaders also visited Israel.

Relations with Israel are good, Samuels says, with plenty of agricultural know-how being imported.

Under military rule, there was only a trickle of foreign visitors, he says. But now, dozens arrive every week, including many from Israel. In fact, TripAdvisor touts the synagogue in its Top 10 things to see in Yangon.

Samuels beams when he describes Chanukah here. "Oh, it's amazing. Jews, Buddhists, Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Baha'is all sit in one room participating in a Jewish holiday. It's a miracle." ■

A moving, insightful narrative of Holocaust experience

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The powerful Holocaust movie Son of Saul, which is up for the best foreign film prize at the Academy Awards on Feb. 28, presents a gut-wrenching view of Auschwitz-Birkenau from the point of view of a Sonderkommando – part of a group that herds prisoners into the gas chamber, processes their belongings for valuables, ferries the corpses to the crematoria, and prepares for the next trainload of doomed Jews. Although shot in a studio, Hungarian director Laszlo Nemes' remarkable film resembles what might have resulted had an actual Sonderkommando been wearing a hidden body camera.

As the New Yorker recently remarked, a movie that staged such nightmarish scenes without an overriding dramatic structure "would not be watchable, or even defensible." Still, the Holocaust has spawned an enormous genre of literary and artistic works based upon such imagery.

The Weight of Freedom by Nate Leipciger is one of the latest titles to emerge from the Azrieli Foundation, which has published dozens of well-produced Holocaust survivor memoirs in Canada over the last decade. The Weight of Freedom presents a well-written description of life and death at Auschwitz-Birkenau and other slave labour and concentration camps. Told by a sympathetic narrator, the story is gripping, moving and insightful.

Born in the town of Chorzow, Poland, Leipciger experienced the horrors of the Sosnowiec Ghetto, Auschwitz-Birkenau and various camps in Silesia. Although he lost his mother and sisters, he and his father miraculously managed to stay together throughout their prolonged ordeal. Both of them survived and came to Toronto.

Like a cosmic black hole, Auschwitz-Birkenau was a place where light (and life) were seldom allowed to escape. By all odds, Leipciger should have perished there or in any of a dozen other situations during the Shoah. Brought to the brink of death, he was ultimately spared to give powerful testament to the insane, morally perverted world he had entered.

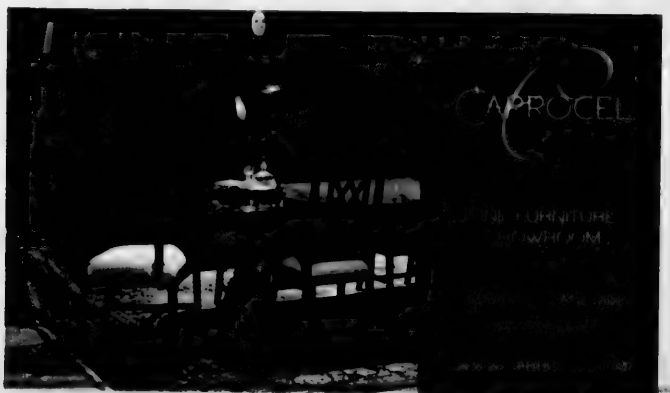
At Auschwitz-Birkenau, the "continuous flow of transports and the knowledge that unsuspecting people were being marched to their deaths in the gas chambers was unbearable," he writes. "On some days, the smoke from the crematoria obscured the sun, creating a continuous dull grey transition from day to night."

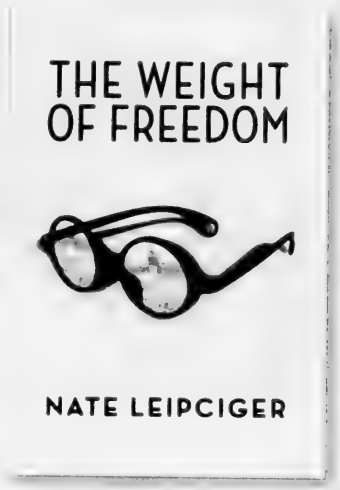
Transferred to another camp, he found that death was again omnipresent. He was assigned the task of carrying the dead from the barracks onto pyres for burning because the crematoria could not handle the camp's daily quota. Disease was rife, especially typhus, and lice had infested everything: "A shake of our clothes and we would see the lice fall out like sand."

What made existence slightly more bearable for him was the guiding presence of his father, who gave him a modicum of hope. In one instance, the ailing, malnourished teenager was ready to go to an infirmary, until his father dissuaded him. Later they found out that all the infirmary patients had been taken to the forest and shot.

Forced on a series of long marches, the lad became dangerously weak and felt he lacked the strength to continue. The marches had resulted in the loss of thousands of participants, and Nazi guards randomly shot stragglers who seemed too weak to go on.

"For my father and me, survival depended on staying together; we had to sustain the will to live for each other," he writes. When at one point he told his father he no longer cared what happened to him, his father responded angrily: "I will not hear of this, and I will not leave you. We did not give up before and you must not give up now. You will come with me even if I have to carry you."





The Weight of Freedom
Nate Leipciger

(Azrieli Foundation)

> For my father and me, survival depended on staying together.

The Flossenberg camp, where they ended up, was so close to a nearby town that inmates "could practically see into the white curtained windows with flower boxes on their sills. Boys and girls congregated on the street, leaning on bicycles and having a good time horsing around." For Leipciger, despite his weak and emaciated state, it was a reminder that normal life still existed beyond the barbed wires and sentry towers. Then one day, American soldiers arrived to liberate the camp. "As a rupture in a dam, floods of emotion so long suppressed – joy, tears and laughter – were uncontrollably released. My father and I embraced, danced, laughed and cried with joy." In their mad rush for food, some prisoners even tore away the flesh of a dead horse.

When some American soldiers asked him to open his shirt so they could photograph his skeletal body, Leipciger agreed. "I felt like a freak, exposing my emaciated body, but I complied as I was eager to be part of the documentation." Afterwards, he was admitted to hospital where he battled typhus, so weak he couldn't lift his head from the pillow.

After a postwar trip to Poland in a vain search for family members, he returned to his father in a German displaced persons camp to await their Canadian visas, a process that took years.

"In Germany at the time, no one wanted to speak about what had happened to the Jews. Everyone blamed it on the SS and the Gestapo and claimed no personal knowledge, nor did they show remorse. No one was prepared to accept responsibility. 'The Jews one day all just disappeared, no one asked any questions,' was the typical comment."

One day, he nearly drowned while swimming, but was saved by a German while several Jews stood by, not caring to rescue someone they wrongly assumed was German. The incident had a "profound influence" on him, making him realize he could not tar all Germans with a single black brush.

He and his father came to Toronto in June 1948 and were met at the station by an uncle whom the father hadn't seen in 36 years. "For the first time in my life, I saw [my father] cry, his tears flowing uncontrollably and his body shaking as he hugged his brother."

Slowly integrating into Canadian life, he was profoundly influenced by a remark from Rabbi Emil Fackenheim after a talk at Holy Blossom Temple. When Leipciger commented that he would not want to bring children into a world that persecuted Jews as the Nazis had done, Rabbi Fackenheim "became agitated and asked him to come forward and said, 'Young man, this is exactly what Hitler intended. Don't you see you are giving Hitler a posthumous victory?' His words jolted me into the realization that the Nazi indoctrination and propaganda had worked on me: I was its victim. Little did I know, at the time, that this proclamation would one day become Rabbi Fackenheim's thesis and be the basis of his proposal for a 614th commandment."

An engineer who built up a large firm in partnership with others, Leipciger married, raised three children, and began writing his memoir at the age of 84. A leader in the Holocaust education movement and the annual March of the Living, he describes returning to Auschwitz-Birkenau and climbing the gatehouse tower to an observation room where, for the first time, he could see the entire camp in its entirety.

"This view was not one we could see as prisoners," he writes. "I never knew the enormity of the camp. This, without a doubt, was a huge murder factory. No one could dispute it. It was overwhelming."

Keynote speaker, and one of the CJN Prize judges, Barbara Kay provided an entertaining and thought-provoking speech on polemic writing. But the night was owned by the community's young writers who had the audience enthralled as they each read their Jewish-themed essays. ASK ELLA

When the going gets tough, is it time to bolt?

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

My husband Paul and I have been married for five years and have a four-year-old daughter. Paul was laid off work a few months ago. His severance is coming to an end, and it has put a huge wedge between us. All we do is fight. The job market is challenging, and we live in Toronto with a mortgage, car payments and living expenses that can't be managed on one salary. Our daughter cries and is crankier than ever. She feels our tension.

I'm hoping we'll get through this with our marriage intact, but as each day passes, we are growing further apart. Inappropriate comments are being said that can't be taken back. The love we shared is taking a back seat to this stress. Help!

Marriage Meltdown

Dear Marriage Meltdown

Money problems can ruin a marriage, and yours has been hit squarely in the face by our economy. The fear and constant anxiety of the unknown are overwhelming. You need to regroup both emotionally and financially. Take a deep breath, put your anger aside and communicate as a team. You need a concrete plan.

Toronto is a very expensive city. This can work to your benefit. For starters, you are homeowners at a time when prices have soared. Depending on when and where you bought your home, it's probably increased in value. Talk to a good, experienced real estate agent who knows your market, as well as markets outside of Toronto. It's free. You may discover you are sitting on some substantial equity.

Create a realistic a budget you can both stick to. Can you manage with one car for now? Where can you sacrifice? Seeing numbers on paper forces accountability and makes it easier to trim expenses.

In the grand scheme of things, this is a blip, albeit a big one, in a lifelong marriage. Don't forget to make time to enjoy yourselves, too, with family activities like a walk in the park, ice skating, tobogganing or playing games. You need fun to balance the stress and to remind you of why you fell in love in the first place.

Work together and support each other though this challenging time. It won't last forever. Hunker down and ride it out. You have a strong common goal: your family. Working together through this crisis will empower and strengthen your marriage. You can do this.

Dear Ella,

I agreed to meet Andrew after connecting online. We met at Starbucks and talked for a couple of hours. He asked if I would like to continue our chat over dinner, and I agreed, until he suggested we go to his place for dinner.

I was really taken aback. How could he think I would agree to go to his place after knowing this stranger for two hours?

I suddenly felt incredibly uncomfortable and realized I had misjudged this guy. He was shocked at my reaction. All I wanted to do is get out of that coffee shop and run. What do you think?

Couldn't Run Fast Enough

Dear Couldn't Run Fast Enough,

Good for you for not allowing yourself to be pressured into a situation you are uncomfortable with.

Dating requires a balance. You allow yourself to be a little vulnerable by letting your guard down so your date can get to know you while staying true to your feelings and never doubting your instincts.

Never allow yourself to be in a situation where you don't feel safe. If Andrew can't understand that a first date should never take you to a secluded place where you are alone together, then Andrew is either completely out of touch with the etiquette of dating, or he has an ulterior motive.

Either way, bravo for not allowing yourself to be pressured into feeling like you're the one with the problem. You've got your values and intuition intact. I only hope that anyone else who comes across Andrew is equally as confident in their decision, or is a specialist in krav maga. ■

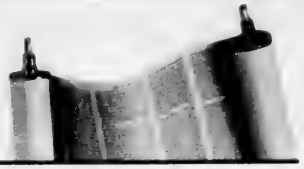
Ki Tisa | Exodus 30:11-34:35



Rabbi Ilan Acoca wonders why Judaism is so detail oriented. Does it really make a difference to God?
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explains why the Torah does not emphasize systematic theology
Rabbi Catharine Clark considers how our religious tradition approaches social change

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

The parshiot read shortly before Ki Tisa this week dealt with the construction of the Mishkan (Tabernacle).

The Torah is extremely detailed about the building, including which materials are to be used, the measurements to follow and the amounts of various items needed.

Why is it so important for the Torah to provide all this detail? Furthermore, why is Judaism so detailed? Does it really make a difference in God's eyes?

In order to answer the question, let me share with you an anecdote.

A while ago, a heart surgeon I know showed me microscopic glasses he had just gotten to assist him with his surgery and increase the success of his operations because of their accuracy.

What I learned from this was the importance of details. In this kind of surgery, missing a spot by one millimetre could mean life or death.

When it comes to serving God, it is no different. We perform mitzvot in order to create more light and positive energy. To be able to create this energy, we need to follow the details that are prescribed in the Torah and in the words of our sages.

I would like to take it one step further – if details are so important, isn't it incumbent upon us to preserve our customs that our ancestors left for us as a legacy? These customs might be details, but they are important details.

I am often saddened to see that people leave their ancestors' tradition in order to adopt another one. Who gave them the right to do this? Is their ancestors' tradition less important than the one they have adopted?

As Am Yisrael, the People of Israel, we are supposed to be united as one nation that might have different traditions but is serving the same God. Let us all respect our differences and unite together as one nation. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

There are three biblical sins that are seen as transformative of the destiny of humanity and the Jewish People. They are the eating of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil despite the direction of God not to do so, the mould-casting of the Golden Calf when Moses' return is delayed, and the reluctance to enter the Land of Promise after the report of the spy-scouts.

Each represents an expression of anxiety, a lack of trust. Each results in an exile: from Eden, from the Presence of the Divine, from immediate entry into the Land.

The episode of the Golden Calf indicates not only an impatience for and uncertainty about the return of Moses from Sinai. It also demonstrates the human yearning for a God that can be frozen, captured, made permanently present, easily understood. Idols fix a conception of God in one form. But the God of the Bible is Y-H-V-H, a divine being whose very name indicates an enduring process, "I will be what I will be." No single image would suffice.

Perhaps that is why the Torah tradition does not emphasize a systematic theology (although medieval philosophers, engaged in disputations and polemics with other religious faiths, did try to articulate one). Instead, we have a tradition of narrative theology, a sacred saga of the relationship between our people and God.

Thomas Mann once wrote that "music and narration… present themselves as a flowing, as a succession in time, as one thing after another and… differ from the plastic arts, which are complete in the present."

As we sing our prayers, tell our stories and do our mitzvot, we construct our covenantal relationship, more enduring than any single image. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

The consumer model of social change is a popular one. Individuals who care about the environment are urged to compost or drive an electric car. A person who believes that animals have rights might buy only meat that comes from free-range animals rather than from animals that were confined to large feeding operations. The thinking behind these purchasing decisions is that, if enough people make them, carbon emissions will decline, animals will not suffer and the world will be a better place.

Parshat Ki Tisa does not buy this argument. The parshah includes the formula for making the oil to anoint the Mishkan (Tabernacle), its equipment and the priests who will serve in the Mishkan. The instructions conclude with a prohibition and a punishment: anyone who makes this oil in the same proportions for anything other than the above-stated purposes will be cut off from his kin.

Rashi pays close attention to the specific language of this prohibition. Drawing on a talmudic discussion in Keritot, Rashi clarifies that only the perfumer who mixes the oil will be cut off from his kin. A person who happened to acquire this oil and anoint himself with it would not be liable.

In this view, for the oil to be reserved exclusively for the Mishkan, it would not be enough to punish the consumer. Restricting use of the oil to the Mishkan could not rely upon consumer choice, even consumer choice limited by the heavy disincentive of being cut off from one's kin. Rather, the law punishes the producer. Such an insight should make those of us interested in social change look less to improving consumer choices and more to reforming the laws that govern production. ■

No secret to making great rice

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Many people, who are otherwise good cooks, seem to have a difficult time with cooking rice. It comes out sticky or gluey – or sticks to the bottom of the pan no matter what they do.

One "secret" to successful rice cooking is to use the proper rice for the dish you're making. There are several varieties of rice, generally classified as long grain, medium grain and short grain. Brown rice is whole grain rice. It has a mild, nutty flavour, and is chewier and more nutritious than white rice, but goes rancid more quickly because the bran and germ – which are removed to make white rice – contain fats that can spoil. Basmati rice is a small, but long grained, aromatic rice with a nutlike flavour and aroma.

Long-grain rice is the least likely to stick together after cooking and what you want to use in dishes that call for light, fluffy rice. Medium-grain rice is a sticky rice – good for sweet dishes and sushi. Medium- and short-grain rice are basically the same thing.

This is Jamie Oliver's basic recipe for getting perfect rice every time. Once you've got the hang of that, you can flavour it with things like fresh herbs, a cinnamon stick, a strip of lemon zest or even a green tea bag in the water with the rice.

Put a large pan of salted water on a high heat and bring to the boil. Rinse the rice in a colander under running water for about 1 minute, or until the water runs clear. Add your rice to the boiling water and wait for the grains to start dancing around. From that point, boil for 5 minutes.

Drain the rice in a colander. Pour 1 in. of water into the pan, put it back on the heat and bring it to the boil again, then turn down to a simmer. Cover the rice in the colander with foil or a lid. Place the colander on top of the pan of simmering water and let the rice steam over it for 8 to 10 minutes. Remove from the heat and if you're ready, serve immediately. If not, leave the foil or lid on and put aside until ready to serve – it should stay warm for about 20 minutes.

White basmati rice with tah dig

- ❑ 6 1/4 cups water (filtered is best) plus more for washing rice
- ❑ 2 tbsp. salt
- ❑ 2 cups Indian basmati rice
- ❑ 1 Yukon gold or red potato
- ❑ 1/4 cup canola oil plus more as needed

Bring a nonstick 4- or 5-quart pot with 6 cups water to a boil. Add the salt. Meanwhile, place the rice in a large bowl and run under water, agitating it with your hand, until the water runs clear. Drain it and then place it in the pot of boiling water. Stir it to be sure it doesn't stick. Let the rice boil rapidly, stirring periodically, 5 to 10 minutes, uncovered, until halfway cooked. If you taste it, it will have some resistance to your teeth but you will be able to bite through it. Drain and then rinse the rice under cold water to stop the cooking.

Rinse and dry the rice-cooking pot. Slice the potato into 1/8-in. thick slices. Pour the oil into the bottom of the rice pot; you want a layer of oil about 3/8-in. thick.

Cover the bottom of the pot with a layer of non-overlapping potato slices. Add the rice and smooth it to cover the potatoes. Drizzle with 1/4 cup water. Cover the pot and let the rice cook over medium to medium-high heat 30 to 40 minutes until the rice is cooked through and the potatoes and rice make a crust at the bottom of the pot.

Remove pot from stove, uncover and place a serving platter on top of pot. Invert tah dig and rice onto plate. Remove pot and serve. (Makes 10 to 12 servings)

Garlic cilantro lime rice

I have served this recipe, by Rhee Drumond, both warm as a side dish and cold as a salad. Either way, it's delicious.

- ❑ 1 tbsp. canola oil
- ❑ 3 cloves garlic, minced
- ❑ 1 large onion, chopped
- ❑ 2 cups long-grain rice
- ❑ 1 tsp. kosher salt
- ❑ 3 to 4 cups low-sodium chicken broth
- ❑ juice of 3 limes and zest of 2 limes (hold back juice of 1 lime for garnish)
- ❑ chopped fresh cilantro, for garnish

Heat the oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Add the garlic and onions and cook for 3 to 4 minutes. Reduce the heat to low and add the rice and salt. Cook over a low heat for 3 minutes, stirring constantly to make sure the rice doesn't burn.

Add 2 cups of the broth and the juice and zest of 2 limes and bring it to a boil. Reduce the heat to low, cover and simmer for 10 to 15 minutes or until the rice is done. Add more liquid as needed. The rice shouldn't be sticky. Just before serving, stir through the juice of 1 lime and lots of chopped cilantro. (Makes 8 servings) ■

Dr. Avram Mark Clarfield on geriatrics in the Negev

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Avram Mark Clarfield is a Toronto-born doctor and director of Ben-Gurion University's Medical School for International Health. He previously worked as chief of geriatrics at the Sir Mortimer B. Davis – Jewish General Hospital in Montreal and as head of McGill University's division of geriatric medicine. In 1992, he made aliyah and headed the division of geriatrics in Israel's Ministry of Health. He was subsequently appointed head of geriatrics at Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva. His research specialties include Alzheimer's disease and the related dementias, the organization of health care services and medical history and ethics.

Earlier this month, Clarfield spoke at an event in Toronto presented by the Aliyah Division of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University called "Medicine in Southern Israel."

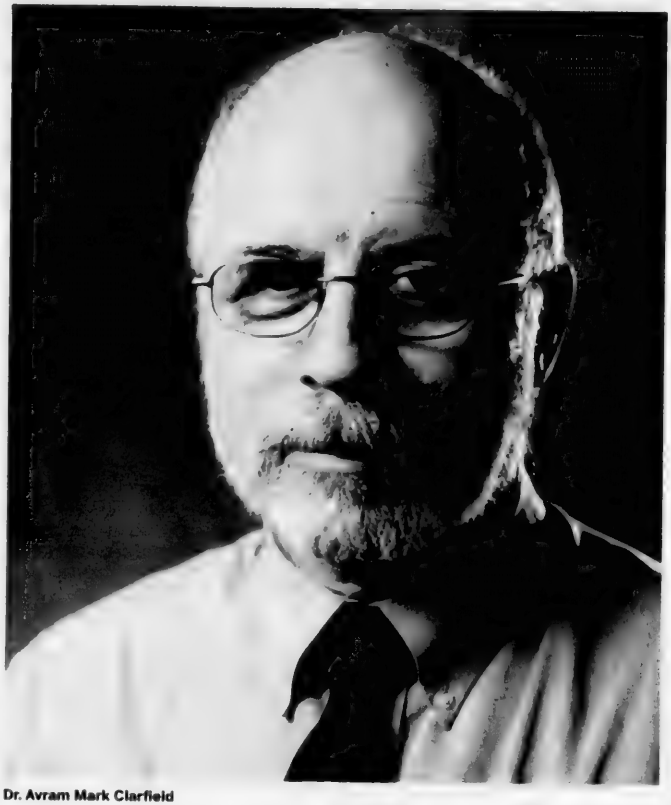
What kinds of things did you speak about at the Toronto event?

I addressed medical services in southern Israel and talked about my amazement, as a Canadian, at how excellent the medical system in Israel is in general. It's a country in the middle of nowhere surrounded by Arab countries, most of which are hostile to Israel. And despite the lack of natural resources, over the years, the country has developed a one-of-a-kind system of medical care.

I spoke specifically about Ben-Gurion University, where I work, and the fine medical schools that exist there – there's one school for Israelis and another one for foreigners. The Medical School for International Health specializes in global medicine. It's the only medical school in the world to focus on that and it's in the middle of nowhere. Students come from all over to study there

Then I talked about the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement and how, oddly enough, Israeli academics have tended to be very blasé about it. In my view, it's a very serious threat, but it's been difficult to mobilize Israeli academics against it. BDS is big in North America, particularly in the humanities fields – less so in the hard sciences – so you can understand why Israeli academics, especially those not in the humanities, are fairly oblivious to it.

We talked about how BDS is mainly run by anti-Semitic anti-Zionists. I pointed out that not every anti-Zionist is anti-Semitic, but most BDS leaders are both anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist.



Dr. Avram Mark Clarfield

How have you seen the efforts of the BDS movement play out in the medical field in Israel?

Fortunately, in the medical field, we almost don't see it at all. I'm involved with BDS stuff because I'm an academic, but its presence is rare in medicine, engineering, physics, chemistry, etc. It's common in the humanities – particularly in disciplines like anthropology and linguistics. Still, I'm convinced that if we don't do anything about it, it will seep into medicine.

Why do you think it hasn't affected the hard sciences much?

I think it has to do with humanities thinkers' way of looking at the world. Much of anthropology literature is now neo-Marxist, and that's never been sympathetic to any kind of nationalism, though I do think that BDS supporters in the humanities are capable of criticizing Jewish nationalism while at the same time being sympathetic to Palestinian nationalism. They give them a free ride for their behaviour, but criticize us for ours.

> Despite the lack of natural resources, over the years, [Israel] has developed a one-of-a-kind system of medical care.

In what ways is Ben-Gurion University leading the charge on geriatric care?

Because Be'er Sheva is the only major city in the Negev and Ben-Gurion University is the only medical faculty in the Negev, it's essentially the only game in town. That means we organize all these services for the elderly that are co-ordinated with the hospital. So there are really good community services, and we're able to liaison between them. This is unique, because in other places, people often come home from the hospital and then get lost in the shuffle in terms of community or medical services. We're trying to build services that reduce the likelihood of people getting lost.

We also do research at Ben-Gurion University on dementia and care. For example, we did a study comparing Israeli institutions with Canadian institutions and divided the Canadian ones into Jewish and non-Jewish. We looked at Baycrest and Sunnybrook (which isn't Jewish) in Toronto, and in Montreal, we looked at Maimonides Geriatric Centre and a Catholic hospital in Quebec. We compared these four Canadian hospitals to two hospitals in Israel, looking at the rates of tube feeding for patients with last-stage dementia. We found that Israel has a high rate of feeding patients with a tube, while in Canada, it's lower. We also found that the Jewish institutions in Canada have a higher rate of using tube feeding than the non-Jewish ones.

What's the relevance of comparing rates of tube feeding?

There's an ongoing discussion in geriatrics about whether to tube feed end-stage dementia patients at all.

A lot of doctors don't believe that tube feeding is the best way to feed end-stage dementia patients, but instead believe you should feed the person with a spoon, and whatever they take in, they take in. The idea there is that people with end-stage dementia are like end-stage cancer patients, that we shouldn't force-feed them, but focus on palliative care. We hypothesized that religion and culture play a role in the decision to use tube feeding, and we found that it does.

We found that Jewish religion and culture emphasize feeding a patient over not feeding them. We're not saying one approach is necessarily better than the other, we're just looking at the different values at play. I actually think it's worse to force-feed patients. ■

The case of the unlikely Holocaust scholar

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

How did a secular Jew, who didn't even know he was Jewish until he was 11, become the world's authority on Auschwitz?

Living in Holland with his family, the boy came home one day during the Six Day War and found his mother in tears. She feared that she was living the nightmare of World War II all over again, and confided in her son that they were Jewish. She had been hidden during the war and wanted to spare him her fate.

That boy, Robert Jan Van Pelt, grew up to become a historian at the University of Waterloo's school of architecture. He became a renowned scholar on the architecture of Auschwitz and was called as a witness in the David Irving Holocaust denial trial in England. He prepared a documentary on Auschwitz for BBC News. His entire professional career has been devoted to expose the lie of Holocaust denial and to teach the truth of what happened during the war years.

The life story of this journey toward Holocaust scholarship is remarkable. As a young boy, he was unable to attend high school due to grave illness and was home-schooled instead. But still he passed the university entrance exams and was admitted. He considers himself a kind of survivor to this day and identifies with his mother and all those who have overcome the most serious obstacles to testify to the value of life.

The real moment of epiphany, however, came during his PhD defence. His thesis was on the Cosmic Speculation of King Solomon's Temple. One of the professors asked him if there is any building in our time that rivaled the Temple of Solomon in importance. Unprepared for the question and before really having a chance to think, he said, "Yes. Auschwitz."

Thus a career was launched.

That career has led to a realization that both Rome and Jerusalem have shaped the history of Western civilization. Van Pelt's research has attempted to find the balance, to retain the belief that we can enjoy the accomplishments of Western civilization and not lose the spiritual life offered by the Judeo-Christian faith tradition.

> What is unique and important about his research is the emphasis on physical evidence.

As a historian of architecture, van Pelt feared that the architectural legacy had morphed from creations such as the Parthenon and the Pantheon into the concentration camps and the crematoria. What, indeed, had happened to what we consider "civilization" in order for such a transition to have taken place? Reflecting on the meaning and implication of the camps, forces consideration of what it means to be civilized. For that reason, van Pelt's work is not morbid but rather a necessary corrective in the quest to understand what it is to be human.

What is unique and important about his research is the emphasis on physical evidence. Other scholars examine historical forces, events that occurred and effects on people and their lives, which are all valid approaches. Van Pelt's rigorous and focused attention on the construction of the camps, and methods of mass murder, constitute irrefutable evidence of historical truth and a wakeup call to the conscience of humanity.

His current project is called The Evidence Room. It will be exhibited at the 2016 Architecture Biennale in Venice, attended by well over 200,000 visitors and attracting worldwide media attention. The project is an example of a new discipline: architectural forensics. The exhibit will consist of life-size casts of key pieces of evidence – for example, gas columns, blueprints, contractors' bills – that demonstrate conclusively that the camp was purposely designed as a factory of death. After Venice, the exhibit will travel to a number of cities.

With each passing year, there are fewer and fewer Holocaust survivors to bear witness. They embody the memory of a tragedy so unspeakable that some would like to see it erased. Fortunately, there are scholars like Van Pelt who are dedicated to making that malignant objective virtually impossible. ■

Who speaks out for the Jewish refugees expelled from Arab lands?

WINNER Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

JASEN SAGMAN

Every year on Nov. 29, the international community marks the anniversary of the UN Partition Resolution 181(II). It is often forgotten that this resolution, dating back to 1947, was the very first blueprint for an Israeli-Palestinian "two states for two peoples" solution. While this resolution was accepted by Jewish leaders, it was renounced by Arab and Palestinian leadership, who also, by their own accord, declared war on the fledgling Jewish state – while simultaneously targeting their own Jewish populations with tangential displacement, and dispossessing Palestinian people from the mandated state.

Had Resolution 181(II) been accepted by the Arab States contiguous to contemporary Israel, there would have been no 1948 Arab-Israeli War, nor the ensuing refugee problems. Instead, the annual UN-organized International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People may well have marked peace within the entire Middle East, as a direct result of the coexistent establishment of Israel and Palestine.

Instead, in May 1948, the local Arab population of Mandated Palestine was joined by seven Arab states in a collective UN-violated attempt to destroy the newly re-established Jewish state. This conflict would become known to Israelis as the "War of Independence," and to Palestinians as "The Catastrophe." This distinction in narratives is vitally important in understanding the plight of both Jewish and Palestinian refugees over the past 67 years.

As a direct outcome of the 1948 Arab-Israeli War, 500,000 Palestinians fled to camps in neighbouring Arab States as refugees, while 160,000 accepted Israel's offer to remain. Today, there are more than 1.6 million Israeli-Arabs living in Israel – 20 per cent of Israel's population!

The subject of refugees remains one of the core issues for understanding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Unfortunately, the rights and claims of one group have come to be promoted at the expense and displacement of the other. This need not be the case, as the question of peace is never a zero-sum game. In fact, the opposite ought to hold true. As the Jewish and Palestinian refugees are reciprocally and intrinsically linked, light shed on one ought to shine onto both.

With the rejection of Resolution 181(II), a vast exchange of populations took place in the Middle East between 1947 and 1952 – with the number of displaced Jews from Arab States exceeding that of Arabs from Mandated Palestine. Despite this fact, the revisionist Middle East narrative holds that there was only one victim population: the Palestinians – and that Israel was responsible. Not only is this factually incorrect, but it rejects the pain and plight of almost one million Jews who were expelled from Arab states for no reason other than that they were Jewish.

Moreover, this revisionist narrative not only concealed the forgotten exodus from memory and remembrance, but it also denied that it was forced. Simply put, the Arab states rejected a proposed Palestinian state by declaring a UN-violated war on the fledgling Jewish state, and targeted their Jewish population living in their respective Arab states. This created two refugee groups: the evacuee Palestinian refugee population resulting from the UN-violated Arab war against Israel, and the Jewish refugees resulting from Arab hostilities against its own expelled Jewish population – which included forced expulsions, illegal confiscation of property, denationalization, arbitrary arrests, torture and murder.

The United Nations also bears express and continued responsibility for the distorted narrative of Jewish refugees. Since 1948, for instance, there have been more than 150 UN resolutions that have dealt unequivocally with the Palestinian refugee plight. Not one, however, has made any reference to, or expressed any concern for, the plight of almost one million displaced Jews from Arab States.

The Palestinians are also the only group of refugees out of the more than 100 million from World War II who were provided with their own special UN agency – UNRWA (the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East) – which, according to its mandate, cannot help but perpetuate their tragedy. Every other refugee in the world is administered by UNHCR (the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees).

Taking into account the imbalance of attention and resources given to Palestinian refugees over Jewish refugees, this essay recommends five steps to rectify a historical wrong and ongoing injustice. Taken individually, these steps would bring attention, retribution, closure and/or compensation to the victims. Together, however, these steps would bring a sustainable and balanced solution for Jewish and Palestinian refugees to live and thrive in coexistent peace.

First, each of the Arab States – and the Arab League – must acknowledge its role and responsibility in the triple aggression of launching a UN-violated war against the UN's newly created State of Israel, the perpetration of human rights violations against their Jewish populations, and the tangential Palestinian displacement and disposition from Mandated Palestine.

Second, reparations must be invoked for Jews displaced from Arab States – including financial compensation.

Third, the UN must recognize the perpetuation that is caused by UNRWA and transfer responsibility for Palestinian refugees to UNHCR.

Fourth, the international community's perception of Jewish refugees must change, including referencing and addressing their plight in balanced measure to that of Palestinian refugees.

And fifth, bilateral Israeli-Palestinian Peace negotiations must include reference to Jewish refugees as well as Palestinian refugees.

The exclusion of and denial of rights and redress to Jewish refugees from Arab states continues to distort comprehensive negotiations between the peace negotiation parties, and to distort a just and lasting settlement plan. As Irwin Cotler, a former minister of justice and attorney general of Canada, once noted, "Where there is no remembrance, there is no truth; where there is no truth, there will be no justice; where there is no justice, there will be no reconciliation; and where there is no reconciliation, there will be no peace – which we all seek."

This call to guarantee the rights and reparations for Jewish refugees from Arab states will not counter Palestinian rights and claims. Rather, it will encourage all parties to recognize the fact that there were two groups of refugees, each of whom are entitled to redress and to an enduring peace and coexistence. ■

What drove the change?

Runner Up Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

RONI ZVEIRIS

What drove the change in attitude toward Israeli immigrants to North America throughout the past few decades?

Background

The last decades of the 20th century created a dilemma for the State of Israel, involving the emigration of Israelis to North America. The following report will describe the transformation in outlook towards the "yordim" and the causes that drove the change.

The importance of this issue is twofold. First, classic Zionism, which proclaims Israel as the Jewish motherland, frowns upon the movement of Jews away from Israel. Second, from Israel's perspective, leaders wish to benefit from expatriates while understanding that a decrease in the local Jewish population is detrimental.

While many Israelis are comfortable with emigrating for the pursuit of prosperity and stability, others debate whether leaving is ethically sensible. Understanding this complex relationship could help Israeli expatriates strengthen their ties with Israel while enjoying the benefits provided by North America.

Beginning of a new immigration movement

Throughout the 1970s, Israeli Jews began immigrating to North America. Unlike Soviet and Persian Jews, who saw North America as a political asylum, Israelis moved for economic or educational reasons. For Jewish leaders, the classic Zionist stance of "shelilat haGolah," ("negation of the Diaspora") explicitly sought to halt the Diaspora as a form of Jewish life. As stated by Itzhak Rabin, those who left Israel were "nemushot" ("weaklings").

While the Israeli government believed that a decrease in population could pose an imminent threat to the nation's security, North American Jews were worried that the Zionist vision was failing if Israelis were leaving the Holy Land.

Integration in North America

The integration process of Israeli Jews can be divided into five stages. First, during 1975-1980, the "explicit denial" policy manifested itself as many Jewish leaders denied that Israelis were immigrating to North America. While this rationale was suitable since many Israelis moved for short-term job contracts, the growth in permanent relocation made North American Jewry more aggressive.

As Israeli immigration grew in the 1980s, it became too large to ignore, forcing Jewish leaders to adopt a policy of "malign neglect." While this did not cause any substantial change, local Jews continued claiming that "they [Israeli Jews] were bad Jews, and the Jewish community should have nothing to do with them."

Towards 1985, Jewish leaders developed the "benign neglect" policy, providing Israeli Jews with the opportunity to participate in the Jewish community. However, the policy prohibited special services that would specifically cater to the Israeli community, such as Israeli-style synagogues. The local community believed that "there is an implication that the citizens who left Israel [should] feel guilty [due to the] betrayal of the shared obligation to protect Israel."

Subsequently, a fourth policy of "containment" aimed to proactively act against Israeli immigration. This involved the creation of Zionist programs that encouraged Israeli Jews and their children to return to Israel. However, these programs had limited success because many Israeli Jews moved to North America for financial motives rather than emotional Zionist considerations.

Thus, York University professor Rina Cohen argues that an "accommodation" policy began around 1990, where the former "communal deviants" started their absorption in community groups. The groups' growth practically forced them to immerse locally because Israelis did not have widespread access to Israeli culture. With time, this led many Israelis to connect to local Jews through themes of philanthropy and Jewish education, both uncommon in Israel. Thus, the stage was ready for a full integration of Israelis into local Jewish life.

Change from Israel's perspective

During the early 1980s, Israeli leaders realized that the purposes for which Israelis were leaving (education, employment, love) could not be easily replicated in Israel. The systematic belittling of Israeli expatriates and motives of Zionist guilt were not effective. Therefore, Israel created a new Diaspora policy in 1985, based on understanding that emigrants will want to come back only if they have some ties to Israel. Hence, Israel encouraged Diaspora Jews to study about Israel's culture and religion, and provided funding toward travel to Israel. This allowed Israeli Jews in North America to create their own local sub-communities, often funded by the State of Israel.

From Zionism to Jewish 'Peoplehood'

As traditional Zionism weakened, the concept of "Peoplehood" emerged. If in the past the Jewish goal was to build the State of Israel, "Peoplehood" argues that the modern focus is to build strong global Jewish communities. Israel no longer requires immediate physical attendance from all Jews because greater contributions can be made through philanthropy, science, technology, business,and education. "Peoplehood" creates a symbiotic relationship whereby global Jewish communities and Israel learn to accept Israeli Jewish immigrants.

"Peoplehood" relies on several pillars. First, it requires using mutual aid to build a global network of prosperous and resilient Jewish communities, wherever they may be. Second, it defines Hebrew as the global Jewish language, favouring the integration of Israeli Jews. Third, "Peoplehood" encourages the strengthening of Israel, creating a common interest between Israeli and North American Jews. Fourth, "Peoplehood" also relies on the common goal of fighting anti-Semitism.

The impact of "Peoplehood" on Israeli Jews in North America is portrayed through the Jewish Agency for Israel. While the organization historically viewed "aliyah" as a core mission, a profound change is now seen through the "Strategic Plan for Israel."

Rather than rejecting former Israelis due to misalignment with "aliyah" values, the plan involves social activism and creation of unique Jewish experiences that is provided through activities in Israel.

Conclusion

Overall, the change in outlook toward Israeli Jews was driven by three factors. First, the North American Jewish community changed its behaviour due to the sheer growth of the Israeli Jewish population. Second, the State of Israel understood that policies of rejection would only distance emigrants. Last, "Peoplehood" reinforced the change by replacing classic Zionism and creating a new mentality that eliminated mistreatment towards Israeli Jews in North America.

How I met my Rabbi

Runner Up Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

ZACK BABINS

First, I came as a rebel. I'll be honest: I was a 16-year-old Jewish atheist/agnostic. I considered myself an iconoclast, smarter than everyone. How could others be so blind that they would give up bacon? Or napping in front of the TV on Saturday afternoons? Or bread for a whole week? After my bar mitzvah, my parents decided to let me decide if I wanted to go to shul. Almost every time, I decided that my bed was too warm to leave.

Then, I came as a teenager. The later years of high school saw a rise in religious attendance: I was dating a girl, and her family went to Kabalat Shabbat services often. Even though I was reciting the words I've known since kindergarten, it was clear that I was not there to pray.

Next, I came as a deserter. I was enraptured by the freedoms of university. At Guelph, sitting in Johnston Hall on that first sweltering day in late August, I found 2-1/2 Jews on my floor of 40, myself included. This was alien to me. Growing up off-Bathurst Street in Toronto, I'd look around the classroom and see 2-1/2 non-Jews! I loved this opportunity to experience other cultures. I wanted nothing to do with the established Jewish groups on campus.

When Hillel and AEPi, the international Jewish fraternity, had their kickoff event in the middle of campus, I walked around three buildings just to avoid them. Even so, when I managed to make a new best friend, it was the other Jew on my floor.

After that, I came with coercion. With first semester over, I was home for the holidays. That meant spending time with my high school friend (my high school persona didn't engender popularity). He had gone to Ottawa and was not as opposed to being Jewish – he had joined AEPi. He'd decided that I was going to as well, and proceeded to talk my ear off until I agreed to go to a single event and try.

A year later, I was running for chapter president, on a platform to repair relations with our local Hillel so we didn't split attendance. That brought me into direct contact with Hillel's director, Rabbi Daniel Levitt. It is written in Pirkei Avot: "Acquire for yourself a teacher, and you will find yourself a friend," and I know that it's true, because it happened to me.

First, I came to him as a client: I have my organization, you have yours. We should work together.

Then I came to him as a friend: his sessions of Jews and Brews, where a number of students would meet him at the campus pub to discuss Jewish issues, often got derailed and turned into just "peers and beers."

> Even now, whenever I need him, I call my rabbi. Not bad for a Jewish atheist/agnostic.

After that, I came as a favour: Hillel had been missing a secretary at their meetings, and since I was filling the same role in AEPi, Rabbi Daniel asked me to fill in. Why not?

Next, I came to him as a challenger: I took an ethics class. Genocide was a topic we discussed. Aside from the usual Jewish perspective on genocide, I started thinking – my bar mitzvah portion was Beshalach. It features a battle with Amalek. Afterward, Moses is instructed to write that God will "utterly blot out the name of Amalek from under Heaven."

This sounded suspiciously like genocide to my ears. I had trouble reconciling that with Jewish history and went to Rabbi D to throw down that gauntlet. How can you believe in this after what's happened to us (repeatedly)? An hour of dialogue later, I understood. Amalek, we decided, was not a race, but the yetzer hara: the inclination, not necessarily to do harm, but to be selfish, lazy, ruthless and duplicitous, and we must blot out the inclination to do the wrong thing, even for the right reasons. It resonated with me. After all, it was what I'd been taught my entire life. I left thirsting for more.

Then I came to him as a student: I had never learned about Judaism or Jews in a collaborative way, or a way that allowed for questioning. I had never learned what it was like to debate a rabbi and have him concede. I wanted to do it again. We set up weekly sessions. I would open the Tanach, from Bereshit on, and read until we found something to argue about. Our hour-long appointments often ballooned to two hours.

Rabbi Hillel famously said that the whole Torah was to not do unto others as you wouldn't want done to you, and the rest was commentary. Yet, most people forget the suffix: "Now go study." Study we did.

Then I came to him as a guest: his family hosted Shabbat dinners for students at their house every week, and I became a regular. It was always a warm environment, reminding me of my parents' house, and it was a free hot meal. I started counting him as a friend.

Next, I came as a candidate: Rabbi D let me know that it might be good for Hillel – and for me, too – if I ran for president. Seeing no other challengers and a void to be filled, I gladly accepted his nomination, and after a hard fought campaign against no one, I won.

Two years later, I left him as a brother: we initiated him into AEPi. More than that, he became my mentor. Someone I could talk to about anything. When I got in trouble, I called my rabbi. When I met a girl, I called my rabbi. When my grandparents died six weeks apart, I called my rabbi. When I graduated and got a job with AEPi and he moved on to another Hillel far away and we had to part ways, I called my rabbi to cry our goodbyes.

Even now, whenever I need him, I call my rabbi. Not bad for a Jewish atheist/agnostic. ■

Loving lullabies: Yiddish cradle songs as vehicles of maternal expression

Runner Up Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

MIRA KATZ BLUMENTHAL

Although often overlooked in serious musical scholarship, the Yiddish lullaby is a genre of Jewish folk song that exemplifies the Jews' tenacity and strength. During the 19th century, the lullaby was a primary vehicle through which Jewish mothers were able to articulate their dreams and aspirations for their children, even under harsh Czarist rule in the Pale of Settlement.

Cradle songs and children's songs from this time reveal the patterns of life of the Jewish mothers, and reflect the widespread social and religious sentiments of the time.

In her article Nineteenth Century Yiddish Folk Songs of Children in Eastern Europe, Ruth Rubin elucidates the social and economic conditions of the ghettoized Pale of Settlement. She describes how music became a means of emotional expression for both women and children in the Pale. As women were often the primary financial supporters of the family, and children commonly worked to support their parents and siblings, children's work songs and lullabies from this period reflect the financial hardships of all members of the Jewish families. Lyrics like, "I must work here to keep from starving" offer a clear depiction of the unforgiving environment of the children's world of work.

Despite these hardships, the lullabies also express a sense of hope. They depict the mothers' yearnings for their sons to become pious scholars and for their daughters to marry devout intellectuals. Rubin explains, "despite the difficult surroundings and the multiple restrictions imposed upon the child by his adult environment, [the] songs reflect the many facets of his intense life," which undoubtedly included religion.

The lullabies reveal that, regardless of the economic deprivation of the era, belief in God remained a primary concern and value to the Jews in the Pale. The children's songs and lullabies that emerged from the Pale indeed reflected the hardships of the restricted lifestyle, but they also revealed the ways in which small freedoms could be achieved through learning and religious devotion.

The Yiddish lullaby is not merely relevant in the context of the Pale of Settlement, however, but is similar to other cradle songs worldwide. Rubin, as well as several other scholars in her field, elucidate the universal qualities of the lullaby. Rubin divides the lullaby genre into two types: natural and unnatural. The natural melodies, such as play songs, counting-out rhymes and chants, have ties to children's songs elsewhere, whereas the unnatural tunes, such as work songs, school songs and war songs, are specifically Jewish and are "characteristic of an oppressed, persecuted minority." Rubin offers examples that emphasize the similarities in both structure and lyrics between European Jewish melodies and those of North America, such as a Jewish cradle song that is similar to the popular North American children's song This Little Piggy

Bubi, bubi, little louse,
in Krakow stands a little house.
Who lives in it? Yash and Marinia.
Three ladies sit spinning.
First spins silk,
Second spins silver,
The third spins gold:

These lyrics are reminiscent of the counting structure of the well-known American children's song. The author draws upon songs from her Canadian childhood, such as Farmer in the Dell and Pat-a-Cake, to draw a comparison between the songs from the Pale era and those of North America and stress the ubiquitous nature of the lullaby.

The voice of the woman is also a topic that has been investigated cross-culturally. Prof. Jodi Vandenberg-Daves, in her course outline for Teaching Motherhood in History explains that the mother's role is enigmatic. On one hand, "women's capacity to bear children... [has] been crucial to the rationales for barring [women] from public activities and public and private power," and on the other hand, in many cultures the female's "histor[ic] responsibility [as] primary caregivers" has been the basis for "particular kinds of female empowerment." The woman's position in society is thus ambiguous; the matriarch is at once discriminated against and respected due to her capacity to give birth.

Although Rubin does not explicitly discuss the enigmatic nature of the female, the traditional Jewish notion of the female voice being distracting and lesser than the male's is implied in her work. In her discussion of Yiddish folk songs, Rubin highlights that the composers of such songs were typically low class. The women who sang cradle songs were often considered "simple folk" who "poured their finest sentiments, their most tender emotions, their most intimate thoughts" into their lyrics.

The supposed subordination of the female voice is in line with the traditional Jewish notion that the man is forbidden to hear the sound of a woman's voice singing because he will get distracted or aroused. The Talmud explains, the "woman's voice is a sexual enticement, as is her hair and her leg."

As such, although the woman is not necessarily considered wholly inferior, her voice is considered a distraction from the study of Torah. Rubin's contention that the female cradle song composers were often part of the lesser social classes, then, parallels the inequality in Orthodox Judaism, for the woman's song and voice are both secondary to that of the man.

In a different vein from Rubin's practical perspective, Judith Kaplan Eisenstein takes a spiritual approach to female involvement in Jewish music. Whereas Rubin carefully outlines the major themes of Yiddish songs and traces the transformations that took place in tandem with socio-historical events, Kaplan Eisenstein considers song as a powerful device that allows the woman to enter into the primarily male dominated world of traditional Judaism.

She argues that as she subjectively explores the music of her own people, she discovers "the raw material for great creation" and a "deep sense of continuity." Although the two writers have divergent approaches and writing styles, both Rubin and Kaplan Eisenstein contend that the songs of Jewish women are expressive of the women's thoughts and emotions about the world around them, and are emblematic of Jewish audacity and strength.

Rubin's contention that the Jews have forever been a singing people regardless of the harshness of their circumstances proves true in her writings. She clearly elucidates how the continuity of the Yiddish lullaby as a genre symbolizes the resilience of the Jewish spirit and the power of the Jewish voice to the mother who suffered quietly as her children grew rapidly and married off, or as her husband moved to America in search of a new life for the family.

It is critical to keep in mind, however, that Yiddish lullabies are not merely reflective of the emotions of an individual mother, but rather a manifestation of the common emotional experiences of a group. They are not merely sweet, crooning tunes with which a mother can lull her child to sleep, but rather a window into the way of life and the personal beliefs of those who compose and sing them. The lullaby acts as a conduit for the dissemination of the social, religious, and political ideals of the performer. When considered from this perspective, the woman is no longer positioned ambiguously as the matriarch of the household who is unjustifiably silenced, but she is given a voice.

This excerpt is part of a larger discussion around the role of the female in Jewish music. For the full version of this essay, please contact Mira Blumenthal at mirablumenthal@gmail.com

MITCHELL CONSKY

As I sit on the quaking metal floor, ascending 12,000 feet into the air, there's one question jumping through my adrenaline-flooded mind: what the hell am I about to do?

The door slides open and furious winds blast inside. I'm tightly strapped to the instructor I just met – some former IDF soldier called Steve or Zeve or Zev – who I'm expected to trust enough to pull the chute on time to prevent my body from becoming a splattered yolk on the far below land. At least I've got a strong grasp on his first name.

He instructs me to scoot over to the edge and let my feet dangle out. "Keep your eyes open," he calls in his Israeli accent, over the hissing wind.

The world below is like an immense quilt of green and yellow patches, vaguely dotted with thousands of microscopic buildings and cars. No turning back now; those dots are about to get a whole lot bigger. Here's a fun fact: I'm horrified of heights.

There are a lot of opinions out there about the rise of stupid decision-making in my generation. In short, my age group tends to believe we're invincible, until that invincibility is challenged; we often live without the consideration of consequence.

Before deciding whether or not I wanted to risk my life for the exhilarating experience of jumping out of a plane, I found myself contemplating what I would actually get out of it. My father, a charismatic personal injury lawyer, would not approve of such an "idiotic excursion." So why do it? Why would anyone dive face first off the edge of danger and harness their life to the hands of a complete stranger?

Maybe it's because of the media's glorification of the "adrenaline-junkie" lifestyle. Maybe it's a literal excuse for jumping out of our comfort zone. Perhaps the fear of death makes us feel more intensely alive. Whatever it is that made me do it, I'm glad I did.

In those 45 seconds of free-fall, as I darted through the sky, strapped tightly to Steve or Zeve or Zev, quickly nearing the great quilt of green and yellow patches, it felt as if I was flying. All terror ceased to exist and was replaced by absolute enthrallment. The earth below never seemed so spectacular. I felt on top of the world, and I was.

But it wasn't just that I was flying. I was flying in my homeland – over the coast of Dor Beach just outside Haifa, Israel.

After the parachute deployed, immersed in the sudden silence of being several hundred feet above ground, the instructor allowed me to take hold of the handles that controlled the direction we glided downward. It was almost like he was saying, "You trusted me, so now I trust you."

He taught me how to do it. Pulling one handle slightly down would make us veer to the opposite side. Pulling hard and forward would cause an immediate sharp turn. It was simple enough.

With a jumping heart, I maneuvered us over an immense body of blue water; it sparkled far below like billions of diamonds rolling for miles out. The beauty was overwhelming. It didn't feel real.

As I turned left and right, sailing over the magnificent land below, breathing in the crisp Mediterranean air, I asked him if he ever gets used to this place. I had heard so many different thoughts on what Israel means to different people.

"Not from up here," he told me.

I realized that it takes a change of perspective to appreciate beauty for what it really is. It's easy to get lost in old views, to see life the way we always have, but a change of sight can allow us to see so much more. Especially sights like this.

There are countless social perspectives, political outlooks and conflicting ideologies that spiral through the Middle East like a destructive tornado. But up here, there was one view that everyone could agree on: the world is small, and we are smaller.

Perhaps a view from up high can fuel insight below.

Such an elevated perspective carries a meaningful theme in Judaism – unravelling a level of selflessness, provoking an understanding that each life is merely a dot in a much bigger picture. I'm not saying we should forget our problems and attain thoughts of drowning existential insignificance; I'm saying we should live our lives knowing that our problems are not the only problems, that the world we see is not the entire world worth knowing.

The experience was more than an opportunity to see my planet in ways I never had; it was a reminder on how I want to live my life.

Skydiving is about letting go of everything you know, everything that makes you feel secure, taking the risk and surrendering to the pull of gravity. The only way to accomplish our greatest aspirations is to pursue that exact same mentality: push beyond the bounds of your life and have faith you don't end up a splattered yolk.

> Whether you can't wait to jump out of a plane, or you view skydiving the way my dad does - we should all refuse to let fear control us.

Whether you can't wait to jump out of a plane, or you view skydiving the way my dad does – we should all refuse to let fear control us. As it normally turns out, a little risk can be the appetizer to the main course. You never know what can be served.

With all this said, there is a difference between being adventurous and being reckless. It's important to remember that our decisions can define us, for good and for bad. Every choice we make has the terrifying ability to change our lives. This can be a blessing as much as a curse.

Travel the world. Learn to play an instrument. Tackle a new language. (Maybe submit to a writing contest.) Do something that scares you and look through the windows of new views. All you need to do is ignore what's holding you back and keep your eyes open.

And if you ever decide to jump out of a plane, take the time to learn the name of the person you're strapped to. ■

Finding Judaism in rural Manitoba

SARAH CZOSNIAK

Like many students of my generation, I had difficulty finding a job after graduation. Applying for jobs in my field in the Greater Toronto Area was my full-time job for three months. But when I didn't receive so much as a call for an interview, I panicked and broadened my search to all of Canada. This led to me accepting the first job offered to me – with a school board in small town Manitoba, population approximately 1,200, and located 20 minutes away from the North Dakota border.

Coming from a graduate program in Montreal and having grown up in Thornhill, Ont., I experienced quite a bit of culture shock upon moving to Manitoba. The Jewish community in Winnipeg is quite large and strong. There are lots of synagogues, a kosher meat shop and a Jewish high school, not to mention the Asper name, which is all over town. But I wasn't in Winnipeg – I was about 300 kilometres to the south-east.

My new home was in a farming community, and I received several offers for a freshly butchered cow or chicken – neither of which were great options for a kosher vegetarian. I was also shocked by the casual attitude toward hunting and guns. Co-workers laughed at me when I inquired about calling the Children's Aid Society after a young student received a gun for Christmas. In my defence, in Toronto that would warrant a call to social services!

Being Jewish in my small town wasn't something I advertised, but it wasn't a secret either. In fact, it helped me bond with Mennonite friends, who spoke about their people's history of persecution in Europe. As the grandchild of Polish Jews, I know a thing or two about European oppression. It was also exciting when working with the Hutterite population of the area, who speak a dialect of German similar to Yiddish. As part of a routine assessment, I asked a young student, "What would you do if you went into a room, and it was dark?" He naturally replied, "Shluf."

Although I never encountered anti-Semitism, there were times when I felt a bit uncomfortable. I had only two vacation days a year, and I had to take both those days in September for Rosh Hashanah, since Jewish holidays aren't exactly recognized in rural Manitoba. It also became awkward explaining to people why I wasn't homesick over Thanksgiving weekend – it's just not a holiday my Jewish family formally celebrates. And I had a hard time defending to a friend why the casual use of "Christmas concert" and Easter art decorations bothered me. She saw a difference between Christmas and Easter as religious holidays and as secular holidays on the Canadian calendar, which I did not.

> I knew that I wasn't, as I sometimes joked, the only Jew between Winnipeg and Regina.

I knew that I wasn't, as I sometimes joked, the only Jew between Winnipeg and Regina. Brandon, the second-biggest town in Manitoba (population about 46,000) has a handful of Jewish people, including the most recent ex-mayor. But being three hours away from the closest synagogue could be isolating. That was why I was enthusiastic to learn about a less well-known story from Canadian Jewish history: the Jewish farm colonies.

During the 19th and early 20th centuries, immigrants from certain backgrounds were settled in "block settlements," or villages, of one ethnicity, throughout Western Canada, including Mennonites, Hutterites, Ukrainians and, of course, Jews. Now that I was a rural prairie Jew myself, I took it upon myself to learn more about the Jewish colonies.

This led me first to Bender Hamlet, Man. After dragging friends down a dirt road off another dirt road, I found a grassy field, with a plaque commemorating the 19 families who built their homes, synagogue and school there, and stayed for 24 years. Apparently there are still some gravestones on the land, but out of fear of trespassing and of ticks, I didn't investigate farther.

More inspiring was the ghost town of Hirsch, Sask. Hirsch is a blink-and-you-miss-it collection of buildings along Highway 18. Apparently there are still some Jews living there (or were, as of a Sept. 16, 2010, article in The CJN entitled "Spotlight on old-timers in small-town Saskatchewan"), but I didn't see a soul.

A few kilometres down the road, however, marked with a simple "Point of Interest" road sign, is the surprisingly well-maintained Hirsch Community Jewish Cemetery. Seeing the rows of Jewish gravestones, in Yiddish, English and Hebrew, was enchanting. The bowl of pebbles to place on the stones was a connection to home miles away in Toronto.

Harsh winters, social isolation and poor farming conditions prompted the Jews of Bender Hamlet and Hirsch to leave their farming communities for bigger cities. And after two years in rural Manitoba, I too returned to the big city. But something keeps me coming back to small, fading Jewish communities.

This Yom Kippur, staying with my fiancé in Ireland, I attended shul, not at one of the three congregations in Dublin, but at the synagogue of the Hebrew Congregation of Cork – Jewish population nine, give or take one big-city Canadian visitor. ■

Israel: The outlier of aid in the Middle East

Runner Up Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

MICHAEL AARENAU

It would seem that whenever the topic of "Israeli foreign aid" comes up, it's too often an argument about how much Israel receives and rarely is it about how much they give. So let's recap.

When the destructive Typhoon Haiyan ripped its way through the Philippines in 2013 leaving over 4,000 people dead and countless others homeless and filled with despair, it was Israel who arrived on the scene almost immediately, with 150 IDF soldiers setting up field hospitals with over 100 tons of food and medical aid arriving with them.

Then in 2014 when countries in West Africa were struck by the deadly outbreak of the Ebola virus, it was the State of Israel that not only constructed field hospitals in the affected areas, but also contributed an additional $8.75 million to the cause, with the United Nations declaring that Israel was the top contributor per capita in the fight against Ebola. And finally, earlier this year when Nepal was struck by a 7.8 magnitude earthquake, it was Israel who sent a delegation of 260 personnel – more than the United Kingdom, the United States, China, South Korea, Taiwan, Italy and France combined – to set up field hospitals and administer aid to the thousands of Nepalese victims who were affected by the disaster.

And now the world is being forced to witness yet another tragedy, the half-decade long civil war in Syria. According to the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, over 320,000 Syrian civilians have been killed and over 1.5 million have been wounded with no sign of President Assad's brutality ending any time soon. With this tragic and gruesome civil war comes millions of innocent civilians displaced from their homes, fleeing Syria and looking frantically for any sanctuary and support that they can find.

While the Arab world continues to point fingers at the West for not taking in enough Syrian refugees, perhaps it's best to look a little closer to home. While countries like Jordan, Lebanon, Turkey, Egypt and Iraq have taken in hundreds of thousands of refugees, the wealthy gulf states of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates have taken in zero refugees while simultaneously profiting from their suffering by selling arms to the rebel jihadist forces and fanning the flames of war (and with Iran taking in zero refugees as well but backing the Assad regime instead).

While the aforementioned nations continue to pad their pocketbooks with the collective pain of millions, it is the State of Israel that is taking action. While the relationship between Israel and Syria hasn't been a particularly happy one, with the two nations engaging in three major wars (the 1948 Arab Israeli War, the 1967 Six Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War), Israel has once again risen to the occasion to help the helpless, with Israeli NGOs providing food, medicine and clothing to Syrian refugees residing in Jordan since 2013.

Additionally, the Israel Defence Forces have erected a field hospital on the Israel-Syria border and has begun treating any Syrian refugees who were lucky enough to escape their decimated homeland.

As if this was not enough, Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Gadi Eisenkot stated that the IDF would act in the vicinity of its border to defend Syrian refugees who were trying to escape the barbarity of Islamic State fighters and Syrian military forces.

> The world is being forced to witness yet another tragedy.

This truly shows the value that the State of Israel places on human life. Given Syria's history of mutual disdain, Israel has virtually no reason to show any compassion. However, the sentiment of "never again" and empathy towards the innocent rings true in the heart of most Israelis and so, once again, the nation is only too happy to lend its support. ■

A festive meal

Runner Up Award for Excellence in Jewish Writing

SHOSHANAH MIRLAS

My family had already anticipated the Rosh Hashanah meal as the delicious smells from the cuisine enchanted the entire house while my mother cooked.

As we do annually, we had invited our cousins and other relatives to join us in the festive meal on the first night of the solemn holiday. When the evening of Rosh Hashanah had at last arrived, 25 people were seated round the long, rectangular table that extended across the dining room floor.
